PARIS, Tuesday, Aug. 2, 1859.

The Peace and the Italian Question continue to be the leading topics of conversation and of discussion in the Press. The conviction gains ground, that the peace was a good thing for France and for Europe, but that the condition of Italy has not been very greatly improved by the war. Indeed, many regard Austria as the substantial gainer, inasmuch as she has now a recognized legal position in Italy, and a conceded right to intervene in Italian affairs, whereas before the war she could only rely upon her secret treaties, her family alliances, and the illegitimate influence which in various ways she had pushed so far. She now, as mistress of Venetia, has a recognized voice and vote in the affairs of the Italian Confederation, and she will never lack the means of making that influence preponderate over the smaller States, whenever it shall be worth her while. This is the view taken by the warmest, and perhaps least reasonable, friends of Italy; and is the natural reaction from the extravagant expectations which they formed at the commencement of the war. They relied upon what they style the "promises" of NAPOLEON, that Italy should be made free "from the Alps to the Adriatic"—forgetting that this phrase was introduced merely as a menace to Austria, and that it can scarcely be held to bind France against all contingencies, and at whatever cost, to continue the war.

I presume the simple explanation of the peace is to be found in the fact that NAPOLEON knew that Prussia intended to join Austria the moment the war should have reached German soil;—and that he did not consider Venetia worth what, under such circumstances, it must inevitably have cost. I have been told on respectable—though it is impossible to say on perfectly reliable authority in any such case,—that he was apprized of this determination, directly from Berlin, within three days after the battle of Solferino; and that he concluded peace so promptly in order to prevent the same communication from being made to the Emperor of Austria, as in that case he could not have closed the war upon so advantageous terms as were obtained. This may or may not be true; but there can be no doubt that he foresaw obstacles of some sort to the prosecution of the war, on which he had not counted at its commencement. It is easy to say that he ought to have carried it on, nevertheless,—that he should not have stopped on account of any apprehensions whatever,—and that he should have driven every Austrian out of Italy, no matter how much treasure and how much blood it might have cost. But considerate personswill have less difficulty in seeing that there is another side to the question,—and that the Emperor had other responsibilities, and other obligations than those he had voluntarily incurred to the Italian people.

How much the war will do for Italy depends very much upon the details of the Treaty of Peace to be drawn up at Zurich, and the results of the Congress which will probably, though not certainly, meet to consider the general question of the European equilibrium as it may be affected by the war. As you will learn from Lord JOHN RUSSELL'S speech, the French Government has invited England to share in the deliberations upon that subject. In the note of invitation Count WALEWSKI says in effect that it will depend upon the several States of Italy whether there shall be a Confederation or not—that this is a matter of purely domestic concern which neither France nor Austria can decide, and that their pledge is merely to further such an arrangement. The Italian States must decide it for themselves. Then comes the question, how shall the will of these States be made known? Will the people of Modena, Tuscany and Parma be consulted, or will the old pro-Austrian princes be restored and then allowed to speak for those Duchies? If a Confederation is to be formed at all, it ought certainly to be in the interest of the people and upon liberal principles: yet it may be so shaped as to strengthen absolutism, and consolidate the system of oppression under which the people of Italy have groaned so long. The question of immediate interest relates, therefore, to the future government of the Duchies. The journals which write with a supposed desire to please the authorities here, are dwelling upon the difficulties which will attend the restoration of the old rulers, and the reasons which exist for supposing that they will hereafter be much less arbitrary and despotic they have been hitherto. They will feel the necessity, it is urged, of liberalizing their Governments, and consulting the wishes of their people; and it is very hard, after all, to deprive them of their possessions merely for the sake of aggrandizing still further the King of Sardinia, to whose dominions the French Emperor has just made so splendid an addition. This is generally considered to indicate a disposition on the Emperor's part to favor the return of the old régime in those States: but it is opposed with great vigor and ability by the Siècle, which is the organ of the Republicans in Paris, and which insists upon the absolute necessity of leaving the people of Tuscany perfectly free to act for themselves in this matter. The Emperor is, in fact, rather pledged to this course; and if both France and Austria pursue this policy, and refrain from sending any troops to constrain the wishes of the people, the question can have but one solution. The people of Tuscany, Modena and Parma will never willingly permit the reinstatement of the old rulers who oppressed them so long, and then either joined Austria in the field of battle or fled for refuge to her dominions. The municipalities of Tuscany have, since the peace, renewed their vote, by a decided majority, in favor of annexation to Sardinia, and it seems altogether probable now that all three of the Duchies will adhere to this desire. If so, they cannot be defeated in their wish by foreign interference without very serious danger of renewed difficulties. VICTOR EMANUEL would scarcely submit quietly to see such an intervention against him. If Austria should attempt it I think he would renew the war alone—and in that case France could scarcely change allies so suddenly as to appear in the field against him. If she chooses to take part in the Congress, England can exert a very important influence upon the decision of these questions; and the recently published dispatches of Lord JOHN RUSSELL give us reason to believe that the opportunity will not be neglected.

The official announcement in the Moniteur that the French army would be at once reduced to the peace footing, has produced a most decided effect upon the public mind in England. You will see evidences of this in the changed tone of the leading journals as well as in the debates of Parliament. A very good impression had previously been produced in France by the measured and tardy, but still important protests of the new ministers against the virulent abuse so freely lavished upon the Emperor, and their explicit declaration that he had been always loyal and true to his engagements as the ally of England. But the constant clamor of the English for an increase of their army and navy, their formation of rifle corps and their incessant denunciations of the Emperor for an alleged intention to break the peace, had created a very uneasy feeling in France. The people were becoming indignant and impatient of this distrust, and there were very strong apprehensions felt, in the highest financial as well as political circles, of coming war. I know that within the last four days some of the most eminent bankers here have expressed their fears of such a result. In the midst of all this doubt and anxiety, and while the English ministry was declaring its purpose of calling upon the French Government for explanations, three lines in the Moniteur announce that France will at once disarm. No more effective or dignified answer could possibly be given to the clamorous complaints of the English: and the result begins to be apparent in the altered tone of public sentiment in Great Britain. The truth is England has been for the last year under the most profound and unaffected fear of NAPOLEON. His policy has been at once so astute and so bold,—he has shown so complete a reliance upon his own resources, and so haughty a purpose to maintain the dignity, the honor, and the influence of France in the affairs of Europe, and his army has proved itself capable of such transcendent achievements on the field of battle, that the English, knowing their lack of preparation for a contest if one should come, have been thoroughly and sincerely solicitous for their own security. They are naturally relieved by the announcement that the French army is to be reduced: and to a very great extent the clouds which lowered upon the horizon have begun to disappear. The English, however, show some reluctance to follow the example of NAPOLEON and call loudly for the continuance of their own preparations for defence. But there can be little doubt that the ministry will modify its policy so as to meet the new state of things. Mr. GLADSTONE at the very outset called for a diminution of army and navy expenses, and recent events will incline the whole nation to second his demand. England wants peace,—at almost any price:—and there is a reasonable prospect that she will be allowed to enjoy it.

Since his return from Italy, the Emperor has maintained great reserve. He has staid at St Cloud, and has only visited Paris two or three times, and then in the most quiet and unostentatious manner possible. Yesterday afternoon he drove in with the Empress to the Tuileries, but remained only about an hour. His appearance in the streets excited no applause, though it must be added there were but few people who were aware of his presence. His personal popularity has not been increased by the winding up of his Italian campaign. Business, however, both in Paris and the provinces, already feels the beneficial influence of restored peace; and reflecting men of all classes rejoice at the termination of the war. I see, by the way, that the Sardinian Government is about to commemorate the battle of Solferino by erecting a monument upon the field. I presume St. Martino will be the site selected.

I find in the TIMES of July 15, a paragraph from the Richmond Enquirer stating that the officers o the United States Army, who had come over to observe the progress of the war, had been refused permission by the French authorities in Paris to follow the army, and that they had accordingly returned to England to consider, as was intimated, the diplomatic aspects of the case. If they did any such thing, they were guilty of a very great folly. The French authorities in Paris probably told them, what they certainly told everybody else, that granting permits to accompany the army was a matter belonging exclusively to the Commander-in-Chief, and that they must apply for such permission, therefore, at head-quarters. I presume that any other Government, under similar circumstances, would have given them a precisely similar answer. To go to headquarters all they required was a passport, properly visèd by the French Police and the Sardinian Minister, which would have cost them about $1 25, and a reasonable degree of perseverance and common sense. Once there they would not have the slightest difficulty in obtaining the permission they desired. Two American officers were on the field at Solferino—one Major KEARNEY, who had a nominal position on the staff of Gen. MORRIS of the French arm and the other Lieut. CARR, who had simply permission to "circulate" in the Piedmontese camp. Major TOWER arrived the day after the battle, and three days afterwards I met Major GRITTENDEN Capt. TODD and Lieut. PEAGRAM at Brescia, on their way. Col. St. GEORGE COOKE arrived subsequently.

I see, also, in a recent number of All the Year Round what purports to be the narrative of a person who visited the field, and who says that the faintest suspicion of being connected with newspapers was quite sufficient to shut him entirely out of the French camp. This cannot possibly be true,—or else his experience was very different from that of everybody else. I had opportunities of knowing something about this matter, and I never heard of a single instance in which permission was refused to any one, properly accredited, to follow the army. Correspondents were there from several of the Paris papers and from the London journals, as well as the NEW-YORK TIMES,—and every one was at perfect liberty to write what he pleased. I have seen it more than once remarked in American journals that caution must be exercised in crediting the reports of the Paris Press, because the Emperor permitted nothing to leave the camp but what suited his purpose. Nothing could be more utterly false, as a matter of fact, or more absurd in itself, as any one acquainted with camps must know. I believe, moreover, that the history of the campaign shows that the statements of the Paris journals were far more reliable than those of most of the London Press. The letters of the London Times, from both camps, were exceedingly able and graphic. Those from the French army were models of military correspondence,—combining scientific accuracy with picturesqueness of style to a very remarkable degree. They were more terse and vigorous, though less ornate, than the famous Crimean letters of Mr. RUSSELL;—and although they were written by a Hungarian, whose knowledge of English was of comparatively recent acquisition, few native Englishmen could write the language with greater correctness or effect. Some of the pretended correspondents of some of the London papers certainly achieved miracles. The writer in the London Star, who gave that graphic picture of Gen. NIEL being found dead under a heap of slain,—and of BARAGUAY D'HILLIERS expiring with his arms around NAPOLEON'S neck, is certainly a genius in his way. I have very little doubt that he will secure an early engagement on the "unrivaled corps" of one of your neighbors. The letters in most of the Paris papers have been brief, and have not given very many details;—but their statements of fact have, as a general thing, been reliable.

You may remember having reported, a year or two since, some exhibitions on Staten Island made by J. D. FARRAR, of a new method of converting iron into steel, which was claimed to be very far superior to any others used or known. The TIMES then pronounced the demonstration very satisfactory, and a company was at once formed in New-York which has from that time to this been applying the process with great success. Mr. FARRAR has spent the last year in England, endeavoring to bring the subject to the notice of capitalists and those concerned in iron there; and he has just arrived in Paris for the purpose of introducing it here. As it is purely an American invention, I am very glad to be able to report its success. An English gentleman of great ability and experience in such matters, told me to-day that he considered it the most important discovery of the age, and that it could not fail to work a complete revolution in the steel manufacture. It makes the very best steel out of common iron, in one-fifth of the time, and at less than half the cost, required by the methods in common use. This certainly sounds like a very extravagant claim—but it is said to be thoroughly borne out by the facts. Over £350,000 have already been raised in England to purchase the patent for that country, which is held, however, at a price considerably above that amount. Nothing has yet been publicly done towards bringing it to the notice of the French, or indeed of any other European nation.

Gov. SEWARD is still here, at the Hotel Vouillemont. He will stay until after the fête of the 15th, and thinks of going then to Rome, in spite of the lateness and heat of the season. His health is good, and is improved by the rest and recreation he is enjoying. Gen. PIERCE has gone to England, where he will remain for some weeks; he will probably return home this Fall. Hon. M. H. GRINNELL is here with his family. He goes to England in September and returns to New-York in October. Mr. ROBERT MORRIS, of the Philadelphia Inquirer, left here with his family for England a few days since, and will leave for home in a week or two.

I send with this a translation of a letter addressed to the editor of La Patrie by B. SZEMERE, President of the Hungarian Ministry in 1848, upon the relations of Hungary to Austria. You will remember that, although he acted with KOSSUTH during the revolution and held a post in the Cabinet during his Presidency, their political views were not the same. He was never so much of a Republican as KOSSUTH, and after their exile he published a very long and very able exposition of the whole question, in which their differences were clearly and frankly stated. The object of this present letter is to counteract the impression that the Hungarian movement of 1848 was revolutionary in its character. He insists that its only object was to preserve the old laws and rights to which the Hungarians were entitled. Its closing paragraph suggests the possibility of such a reform in Hungary as shall satisfy the people and lead to a reconciliation between them and the Empire of Austria. All the Hungarians ask, according to SZEMERE, is the restoration of their old Constitution. This implies that they do not seek absolute independence of Austria,—that they are still willing to be under Austrian rule, but with the limitations of the old régime. I have no doubt that the party to which SZEMERE belongs would be very glad of some concessions, however small, on the part of Austria, which would permit their return and a renewal of the old relations; and it is not impossible that some project of this kind may enter into the scheme of internal reforms to which the Emperor FRANCIS JOSEPH has pledged himself. Whether KOSSUTH, KLAPKA, and their associates, are prepared to acquiesce in such a plan, we have no positive information. KOSSUTH, I believe, is now in Switzerland.

M. FELIX BELLY, whom you know in connection with the project of the Nicaragua Canal, is now here on business connected with that enterprise. He complains warmly, and I must add with justice, of the treatment he receives at the hands of the American Pressand of the misrepresentations of his work and his motives, as well as of his character, in which the journals of New-York so largely indulge. He says the work itself is in the interest of commerce and civilization; that if it shall ever be completed, no people in the world will receive more benefit from it than the Americans, and that, as they do not furnish the money, none can lose less by it if it should eventually fail. He does not understand, therefore, the secret of the bitter hostility with which it has been assailed. The clause in the original concession, which placed the canal under French protection, he has had rescinded, because it seemed to be regarded as unfriendly to American influence and interests; and American commerce is now placed upon precisely the same footing as French commerce, in the enjoyment of whatever benefits the canal may hereafter yield. He thinks the work itself has therefore a valid claim upon the charitable and friendly regards of the American people; and that rival companies, who fear the competition of the canal, ought not to be allowed to control public sentiment in the United States in advance, to its prejudice. The letters from correspondents on the Isthmus, which charge him with dishonesties of all kinds, and which deal in the most wholesale falsehoods concerning his acts, he considers particularly unworthy of respectable journalism. All their recent statements he pronounces utterly untrue. He denies that the enterprise has "exploded," and says it is making substantial and satisfactory progress. His engineers and assistants have not abandoned him nor left the country. He intends to return thither in about six weeks, and has no doubt of his ability to carry through the enterprise which he has undertaken. I give these statements concerning the work on his authority. So far as M. BELLY himself is concerned, I take great pleasure in saying that he is a gentleman of energy, of intelligence, and, so far as I am aware, of unimpeached and irreproachable integrity. He has undertaken a work of great utility and of great difficulty,—whether his ambition does not outrun his ability remains to be seen. But I certainly think he is entitled to more kindly treatment than he has thus far received from our American Press.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PARIS, Monday, Aug. 1, 1859.

In my previous letter I called your particular attention to the fact that the French government was at last getting tired of the constant abuse and loudly heralded mistrust of the English Parliament and journals. The official organ had at last spoken out, and it was evident that the injustice of the charges made against this government and more especially its Ruler, was becoming irritating. The other Paris journals followed the example set by the Moniteur, and England got good advice from many quarters, than one. Alarmed at the fact, the London journals betrayed by the tone of their various leaders how bitter was their mortification at being thus taken to task. "All this comparing estimates is very well," assumed they, "but France is now so very powerful, she has so great an army and navy, that we may reasonably fear an attack from her." Why should they fear this attack (unless they had given reason for one) from an ally? There lies the whole truth of the matter. The English people are aware that their ally, who has always been a firm and true one, has been treated by them as an enemy, and they dread his vengeance, now that his power has become so great. Such an exhibition of fear on the part of a great nation like England, is, to say the least of it, a mean spectacle to present to the world. The journals I above referred to, continued their lamentations by asserting that although France wished to prevent England's continuing her armaments, she would still keep upon the same footing her immense navy and army. The very next day after the appearance of these leaders, and while the journals containing them were still en route for Paris the Moniteur published a short note to the effect that the reduction of the army and navy to a peace footing had been ordered. And as the following queer fact was duly commented upon that day, namely, the Monitor announcing the disarmament, and almost all the London journals having leaders the same day asserting that the Emperor would not put his forces on a peace footing. How blank must the different editors have looked the next day; I mean those who had so strongly affirmed that no such course of events was possible. Decidedly, Louis NAPOLEON is more than a match for the London editors and diplomatists combined. There now remains nothing for the English to do but to disarm—or, I should say, discontinue trying to arm. We must now hear no more of rifle corps or great defences. Their leading organs cried out loudly that they would discontinue the subject, were the French forces reduced. This is to be done, and so England must follow his example. After vain attempts to arouse the English people to such a state as would make them endure the contemplated increase of taxation, the British Parliament had at last hit upon the plan of assuring the tax-payers that they might blame France and her armaments for the increase of taxation soon to be enforced. But this excuse no longer holds good, and England, having obtained all she asked for, must either act as she averred she would, or else prove to the world that it is the English nation that wishes to disturb the peace of Europe, instead of France. The London Times came out in an article professing the greatest joy at the new pleasant turn of affairs; but still the amiable journal could not resist its old habit of insulting the French people and their sovereign—and so it hinted that France thought of invasion for the sake "not of England's beaux yeux, but for the treasure to be found within the walls of rich and splendid London." Could a more gross insult be made to a generous and chivalrous people? England, who has always made money her idol, should beware how she throws stones; her house is entirely too fragile. In reference to this vile assertion on the part of a journal such as the London Times, I wish to make the following extract from the remarkable speech delivered by Mr. Cobden in the British Parliament. In alluding to the many wild rumors that have circulated, he says:

"We were told that they wanted to come and plunder the Bank of England; but the Bank of France always contained a far greater amount of bullion than our great national monetary establishment. Then we were told that they desired to pillage London; but he did not hesitate to say that there was far more portable wealth in France—he meant wealth in the shape of jewelry and ornaments—than in this country. They were a nation that liked that sort of thing; and though we might put more capital into a steam engine, they spent far more than we did on their ornaments. [Hear, hear.] Was it probable that France would descend from its high station at the head of the civilized nations of the globe, and fall into the ranks of savages who were in the habit of making filibustering descents upon their neighbors? [Cheers.] Was he to be told that he was merely one of those peace-men who would rush into danger with their eyes shut? They were far more fanatical about war who overlooked the considerations to which he had been adverting, than he was fanatical on the subject of peace. Were they sure that we had not ourselves provoked all that had happened by our great armaments? He (Mr. Cobden) had kept a careful watch over the subject, and he was by no means prepared to say that we had not brought the whole difficulty upon ourselves by the steps we had taken to fortify our coasts, to increase our fleets, and to create docks for steamships. Take the works at Keyham, which had cost £1,500,000. He well remembered that it was immediately resolved to construct similar works at Brest or Cherbourg. In 1851, he (Mr. Cobden) moved an address to the Queen on the subject. That address was so reasonable that the noble lord did not venture to meet it by a direct negative, and so he moved the previous question. The address was to the effect that Her Majesty would enter into negotiations with France with a view to stop the rivalry between the two countries, and if possible to lead to a mutual reduction of their armaments. On that occasion he brought forward evidence to show that the French had increased their fortifications solely because we had increased ours."

The speech I allude to is a most interesting one, and is the most complete refutation of the many slanderous assertions that have so often appeared in those London journals inimical under all circumstances to France and especially to the Emperor NAPOLEON III. I have often remarked, as an extension of the envy and ill-feeling these journals seem to feel for all that is not English, how very unfavorable and prejudiced are their American correspondents. Let any event which reflects badly upon the American public occur, and at once it is heralded, commented upon, and turned into its worst aspect. Because two men fight in the street, or one man shoots another who has seduced his wife, these papers at once pronounce all Americans rowdies, and set forth the idea that one-half of our male population are seducers, while the other half are of course busy killing them. Such a course of journalism is a false one, prevents the extension of the real sympathies that exist between nations, and should be denounced by the people. A French gentleman who has traveled in the United States, and who took the pains to inquire personally into matters, made the very just remark to me, that English journals had done more to prevent friendly relations between France and America being fully carried out, than aught else. "Go where I would," said he, "I found that the American papers teemed with unfavorable extracts made from English journals concerning French politics. The said extracts always giving a prejudiced and distorted version of facts harmless in themselves, but of great and ominous importance when misrepresented." You will, I am sure, feel, upon reflection, that these remarks are but too true. For many years leaders were published in the most important New-York papers highly unfavorable to LOUIS NAPOLEON and his Government; many of these articles were founded upon the representations of English journals, and sustained by quotations from them. Angered at this seeming injustice, the French organs seized upon all matters not complimentary to our pride as a nation to comment upon. But as soon as truth began to force its way through the films of ignorant misrepresentation, many of the American journals, and notably the NEW-YORK TIMES, gladly seized upon what they deemed the real state of the case, to lay before their readers. It is now no longer the work of a Paris correspondent to invent court scandals, or prophecy great evil to come for France. The American public has become aware that there is some good after all over here. Americans of intelligence and unprejudice have come to France, have studied her institutions, have realized that they are for the best, considering the condition of the people; and these same Americans I refer to have given to the public the result of their personal observations. Already we see the good effect produced by justly reviewing the state of French politics. Where we pay a well-deserved compliment, the really generous Frenchman gives two in return. As an instance of what I say, I may point out the article published last Friday by the Constitutionnel in reference to Mr. RAYMOND'S letters from the seat of war. He paid a well-deserved tribute to the bearing and conduct of the French army. The semi-official organ reproduces the lines I speak of, and in return speaks highly of the enterprise of American journalists,—comments upon the pleasure felt here that they (the Americans) should see and judge for themselves, and ends with a regret that the Constitutionnel should have acted in the least unfriendly spirit by reproducing facts not commendable to us as a people. Now is it not better that all the world should be at peace and good will with one another, when by a few scratches of the pen so much can be accomplished; and how much to blame are those journals which, having it in their power to strengthen the bonds between two great nations, neglect this great duty.

TUESDAY, Aug. 2.

At the present time the political phase in Europe is more reassuring than it was last week, and I am inclined to think that peace is really established. There seems to be a decided disposition on the part of the different European Cabinets to consolidate matters, and to lend their aid to further the interests of the Italian people. In England there must result from the disarmament of France a peace at hall, after the fierce tempest that has swept over the land. Prussia has published her diplomatic notes, and there then the tone of the Austrian journals is less bitter. In fact, there seems a general desire for more peaceful relations throughout Europe than was evinced a week or so ago, with the remarkable exception of those powerful countries, Bavaria and Hanover. The Chambers of these two mighty Powers are constantly agitated by the delivery of the most passionate discourses. At Munich Prof. BAGNATZ, well known—I may say notorious—for the violence of his opinions, detailed Prussia in a speech of several hours' duration. The impetuous orator disdained all discussion, and began by stating that those who differed from him were bastards and good-for-nothings, (bastards and dunces langer.) Of course, after such a commencement, the eloquent Professor found no one bold enough to answer his tirades, which at last became so violent and abusive that the President was forced to silence him, although he did so in the following manner, considered by many as an aggravation of the offence:—He said, "Do not touch the alarm bell; it will ring loud enough." Are we to consider these words as omicous? Let us hope that Bavaria may be restrained, before she breaks through all boundaries, she is so formidable. Next comes Hanover—but here we have the other side of the question, and as candor constituted no one of the chiefs of the Liberal party defended the political course of Prussia with the same energy that the Bavarian orator had attacked it. He even went so far as to blame his own Government, (Hanover,) in the most severe terms, affirming that it had become more detestable than any other in Germany. Decidedly, unless some other Governments interpose, these petty German States will impede the Confederation in a discussion that might easily degenerate into a war. In Italy affairs remain in about the same state they were at the date of my last letter. The people of the Duchies seem as much determined as ever to prevent even by force the return of their former sovereigns. On all sides preparations are made to resist any attack which may be intended, and it is but logical to suppose that the people, showing such determination, will gain their point. Austria cannot, dare not lend her troops to any of the sovereigns I refer to, and as they must depend upon their own resources, they cannot succeed in forcing the people to receive them again. Accounts from Venice are not favorable. It seems that the citizens made a popular demonstration against the Villafranca peace, the result of which has been the arrest of many influential persons belonging to the city. You are of course aware what it means to be arrested by Austrian agents. Unceasing persecution is the fate of those who offend her, and I am afraid that the condition of the Venetians will continue to be an unhappy one, unless the approaching Congress takes their case into particular consideration. At the present time many of the ultra friends of Italy assert that Austria, although losing Piedmont, has gained by the late war, as she now has a well-recognized right to interfere in the affairs of Italy. Her influence over the Pope has hitherto been evident, but circumstances alter cases, and Pius IX. may like the idea of proving to his former friends that he can do without them. It has been announced by several journals that Prince NAPOLEON was to be sent on a mission to Vienna. I am assured by good authority that no such intention exists. Chevalier DEL ANNUNZIO, the Sardinian representative for the Zurich Congress, is now in Paris; he has had frequent interviews with Count WALEWSKI and also audiences of the Emperor. He will soon leave for the place of reunion. It is now supposed that the meeting will begin on the 6th of this month. Prince ESTERHAZY has arrived here from Vienna, he is accompanied by a Secretary and Attaché of Legation. Since the Villafranca peace it is a noticeable fact that the most friendly relations seem to be established between the Cabinets of the Tuileries and of Vienna. Advices received from Parma of the 27th, announce that the citizens of that place, having been informed that deputations from Piacenza, Modena, Reggio and Bologna were to visit them, received the idea with great enthusiasm, and when the deputies, numbering some twelve hundred, came, they were received most heartily.

"The members of the municipality, the nobility, the authorities and the Governor, Count PALLEREI himself, were assembled in the large square, where a most friendly greeting was given to the visitors, amidst cries of 'Italy for ever!' 'Long live VICTOR EMANUEL!' 'France for ever!' All the public and private establishments were thrown open, and the inhabitants vied with each other in doing the honors of the city. A grand banquet was prepared in the public garden, where twenty tables were laid out, each capable of accommodating one hundred persons. Several Tuscans, Piedmontese and French soldiers who happened to be among the guests, were the objects of particular attention. Many of them were wounded, and ladies belonging to the highest aristocracy of Parma might be seen conversing with them with as much affability as though they were their brothers or children. The city was decked out with thousands of Italian and French flags; the banquet was followed by a ball, and at night the city was brilliantly illuminated. During the banquet, an energetic protest of the inhabitants of Piacenza against the Ducal Government was read, and registers were at the same time opened to receive the signatures of all the citizens of Parma who desired to protest against the return of the Duchess and her son."

These are signs of the times not to be disregarded, and evince most clearly the firm will of the people.

The Milanese journals publish the following Order of the Day, issued by GARIBALDI. It is short and expressive

"Whatever may be the march of political events, the Italians, under existing circumstances, must neither lay aside their arms or be discouraged. They ought, on the contrary, to increase in number in the ranks, and testify to Europe that, guided by the brave VICTOR EMANUEL, they are ready to again face the vicissitudes of war, of whatever kind it may be.

GENERAL GARIBALDI."

Another Order of the Day, signed by Col. ANSELMO, appears the same date. It also recommends that the volunteers remain under arms. "Peace," it says, "is not yet signed, and we must remember that we engaged to remain under arms six months after the conclusion of the war. Perhaps at the moment we least expect it the signal of alarm may again sound." While upon the subject of GARIBALDI, I will state that the town of Nice has voted the General a sword of honor, and that due notification of the fact was sent him in a letter from the Syndic of the town, in the name of the municipality, stating that the citizens of his native town felt the greatest pride in his gallant conduct. Gen. GARIBALDI sent the following reply:

MONSIEUR: I am deeply affected and grateful for the generous act of my dear native town. I consider the little I have done for the sacred national cause as only the duty of the citizen, and the satisfaction of my conscience is a sufficient reward. The honorable present which is so courteously made to me by the municipality of Nice is a recompense far beyond my merit. My arm may become weakened and unable to wield the sabre of honor which Nice bestows on me, but to my last breath my heart will lose nothing of its love and devotedness for my native land. Accept yourself, Monsieur, and present to the municipality of our town, the expression of my affectionate gratitude.

J. GARIBALDI.

You will have learnt long ere this that Mr. PERKINS and his family (of Boston) were among the sufferers from the brutality of the Swiss troops at Perugia. The official organ of the Papal Government came out a short time ago with a statement as regards their treatment, which has called forth the following letter from the gentleman in question. It was addressed to Galignani's Messenger, which reproduced the statement of the Papal organ:

VILLA CAPPONI, near Florence, July 24, 1859.

In the Messenger of the 21st you quote from the Giornale di Roma "that the American family, resident in Perugia at the time of its capture by the Swiss, have declared that the troops behaved with a moderation that could hardly have been expected after the provocation to which they had been exposed." Will you do me the favor to contradict that statement? It is one of many assertions made by that journal which have no foundation in fact. The Americans family have never made any such declaration, but, on the contrary, have stated in the most public manner their conviction that the soldiery behaved with the greatest brutality, ferocity and lust. The same journal asserted very coolly that the American family had lost some of their effects which had been or were about to be restored to them. As we lost almost everything we had, to an amount of between 2,000 and 2,500 scudi, in the sack and pillage of the Hotel de France, where we were residing, and as the claim made on the Roman Government by the American Minister has not yet been paid, you will be able to judge how accurate are the sources from which the Giornale di Roma derives its information. Begging you to excuse my troubling you in this matter, which I only do in order to avoid misrepresentation, I remain, &c.,

EDWARD NEWTON PERKINS.

After this the Papal Government can no longer misrepresent a matter which so seriously affects an American citizen. It can but grant immediate and full reparation of a foul wrong. It is to be hoped that our Representative at Rome, whom it was wrongly stated had left that city, will be most energetic in seeing that Mr. PERKINS obtains redress. It is now decided that the entry of the Armée d'Italie shall take place on the 14th of August instead of the 15th, as was at first intended. There will thus be two holidays instead of one, and the troops will be able to profit from the usual number of free amusements offered on that day. On the Saint Napoleon, each year, there is to be a free performance at the French Italian Opera, the Opera Comique, the Comedie Française, the Cirque de l'Impératrice and the gymnase. Of course all these establishments will be filled with easily pleased customers. All the public galleries will be open; many of the private ones, and numberless places usually inaccessible to the crowd will find they be thrown open to the public. The illuminations will be such as the world never saw before; for weeks the preparations have been going on for that purpose in different parts of Paris. No expense is to be spared, the city authorities are to render the occasion one that will live in the annals of the Parisians. An extract from the Champs de Mars One hundred thousand francs are to be given to the soldiers. The troops will be in the Champs de Mars. One hundred thousand francs will be laid. What pyramids of provisions that valiant army slew away that day. Bullocks, sheep, hogsheads of all beverages, I do not doubt, Turcos, Zouaves, Chasseurs, too, will partake of the generous fare. Doubtless, many a brave soldier will be forgotten on the occasion, and the anniversary of Magenta will long remember the 14th August, 1859. Twelve o'clock precisely is the time fixed. The next day the return commences, and will overturn Paris. During the hot weather, it is usual to the watering-places and to the mountains, as the citizens leave Paris at dawn to be present at the opening time. Paris must on that day be splendid contrast, for all are up and doing. The Elysian, and in all parts of the town there will be Bull and Bruin, Punch and Judy, and the Fantoccini. Bruin was present at Longchamp, however, in unmistakable numbers, larger and more fashionable than ever, and in attendance; in the evening, you and no one. The Italians are alive in Paris. Bull and Bruin, Punch and Judy, talked of "Palestro" and "Magenta" and "Solferino" in Spoken both here and in London. The celebrated composer's "Pantoon de Pierrot," the Italian, has been produced in London, with the greatest success at Covent Garden. A celebrated singer, belonging to the troops of the French army, is with the following unfortunate accident, which, happily, was not fatal. He was dancing in the park of Milan, wishing to cross a hedge, he put down his lance to jump over, and then attempted to draw the lance after him, which was caught in the hook and the gun was discharged, the lead so smashing his right arm as to necessitate amputation. Bruin was present at the ball as an artist, and it is a sad thing to report, that stupid railway in his course. Paris has commenced to be going on famously, and the population all seems to be going on famously, and the population for his life are collected. The Prussian Ambassador taken by the Austrian during the war is to be released all returned. They were to be released on the 15th of August, but the Austrian journals state that the number of prisoners taken, how small does the real figure seem, were then captured; one at Montebello, one at Magenta and seventy-seven of Solferino; the French officer was taken prisoner by the Austrians and that was the Duke of Lamoricière, the conqueror of the Cheurcurs d'Afrique, who, mounted on a powerful horse, charged on his fate, the rest of an Austrian regiment, that in the end of the day swept him along. Of course I mean by the Austrian accounts. But I comment on the wounded and now in the Austrian hospitals, the whole number is but 800. The French have lost fifteen thousand! Another Solferino, and we have lost fifteen are least 8,000 wounded, that is, the proportionary difference, which speaks volumes for the nature of the two armies.

The United States and the War in Italy—Views of the New-York Times.

From the Paris Constitutionnel, July 31.

We have remarked more than once the impression produced in the United States by the war in Italy. The great Republic of North America cannot, in spite of distance, remain indifferent to a struggle undertaken on this side of the Atlantic for the independence of a nation. Although sometimes, in her moments of enthusiasm and excitement, she affects to despise old Europe, her mother,—to speculate upon the future and promise herself the exclusive empire of the world,—she can never help showing a lively sympathy for European nationalities which aspire to independence.

On the 4th of July the Republic of the United States celebrated, with juvenile ardor and with all the pomp of popular gatherings, the glorious anniversary of her own independence. The American journals have given detailed accounts of all the incidents of national festival and of the enthusiasm with which the occasion, show us that the Italian cause and Piedmont, its valiant and victorious champion, were everywhere on that day, the object of sympathetic allusions and of warm applause. Every city in the Union sent fraternal greetings to the Italian people, and toasts with applause the triumph of the allied armies. Frequently an orator would be interrupted by the shouts of hurrahs which would follow the mention of the name of some Marshal of France, the hero of a battle. By such incidents the young Republic of the New World shows to what an extent the cause of Italy, defended by France, interests and touches her. Italy and France owe her their thanks for these lively sympathies.

But the United States have done more than send us across the Atlantic the echo of their cordial applause. Some of their journals—the most influential and the most carefully impartial among them—have been unwilling to trust to the English Press for their information and their estimate of events. Their editors have crossed the ocean, and gone in person to the field of battle, in order to give the American public exact reports and true representations of events. We find, for example, and have just read in the New-York TIMES, narratives of irreproachable exactness, written in a lively and picturesque style, and with a degree of originality, piquant and whole new to us. Some of the letters of that journal, written on the field of battle and sent to the United States, from which they have come back to us, we learn are from the pen of the Editor-in-chief of the New-York TIMES himself. We cannot resist the temptation, although the facts narrated in these letters are no longer new to our public, of copying at length from these letters the following passage concerning the discipline and good conduct of our army:—the Editor writes from Castiglione on the evening of June 24—the very eve of the battle of Solferino. [Here follows an extract from MR. RAYMOND'S letter of that date.]

We have given this passage literally, and it is easy to recognize in it the scrupulous fidelity of an eye-witness. It is a piece of testimony in favor of our army, not surprising certainly to us here, but of great value nevertheless, because it comes from an observer who is a foreigner, and who writes in a journal of the New World, without suspecting, probably, that it would ever be seen by a European reader. The impartiality of the American journalist makes it the more valuable, because he is in Europe to judge quietly for himself, with equal impartiality, if it is true, to reproach the American Republic with the excesses and its turbulence.

[illegible] AT SEA ON BOARD OF AMERICAN SHIPS.

In the House of Commons, Friday evening, Mr. H. MUSCROVE MILNER opened an important discussion on this subject, suggesting official [illegible] by Her Majesty's Government to effect such arrangements with the United States as might put a stop to the existing condition of things.

Mr. Milner, from [illegible], pursuant to notice, to move an address to Her Majesty, praying that she might be graciously pleased to take steps to prevent the atrocities which were committed on board American ships on the high seas. The honorable gentleman, in doing so, said the subject was one which had excited the attention of large bodies of men throughout the country, and had involved the question of much injury to British property, and many crimes allowed to go unpunished. The point which he wished the House to consider in connection with this subject was, whether it would be best to take to precedent in the case of these cruel outrages committed on the high seas in vessels engaged in the merchant traffic between England and the United States. These outrages had in a special manner drawn the attention of the inhabitants of Liverpool, which was the great outport of that traffic. It was well by them that unhappy men arrived almost daily in their harbors who, in consequence of the cruel treatment they had received on the voyage, were obliged to be conveyed to the hospitals of the city, where some of them died of the injuries which were inflicted upon them, while others remained there for a long time convalescent. Now, the Government of the United States had expressed through their consul, a desire that some inquiry should take place into the matter, while on the other hand, the people of Liverpool had taken up the subject with a warmth because the wrong of Englishmen. Yet it did not appear that Her Majesty's Government had taken any steps to bring the perpetrators of those crimes to justice. Mr. Bunsen, a Liverpool merchant, had addressed a pamphlet to the honorable member for Bedford, setting forth the evils which at present prevailed in that respect, and the honorable member had intended to bring the question under the notice of the House. He had, however, since joined the Government, and had by the acceptance of office, it would seem, become incapacitated from being of any use out of his own department in the House or in the country. [Hear, hear.] Mr. M. Milner had, however, deemed it to be his duty to take the question up, and he should at once proceed to inform the House that the grievances of which he complained divided themselves into two [illegible]. The first branch embraced those offences which came within the operation of the treaty of extradition existing between the United States and the United States, and he could assure the House that even in the case of those the current [illegible] of crimes the arrangements were so complicated that it was almost impossible to bring the perpetrators to justice. An outrage which had been committed on board the ship Emma had, for instance, been brought before Baron Bazewell last year, and, in consequence of its having taken place two miles and a half beyond what he considered the jurisdiction of Great Britain, he had not decide on the case, while the offender was handed over to the American Consul, who transported him, together with the witnesses, to the United States; but the moment he had reached his native shore the witnesses absconded, and he escaped punishment. Two cases of a somewhat similar nature had occurred within a very brief period, and within the last month a murder had been committed on board the American ship Montezumer, which had arrived at Amsterdam from New-Orleans via Amsterdam. The mate, however, had some work to get the perpetrator of the murder kept in proper custody, and had applied to the American Consul on the subject, who in his turn had addressed an application to the magistrates of Amsterdam for the use of a cell in which the criminal might be confined, undertaking to pay the necessary expenses. The master had eventually brought under the notice of the right honorable the Secretary for the Home Department, and it was then that the request of the Consul was at last complied with. The consequence had been that the criminal had escaped a few days after, and had been recaptured by the people of Sunderland, but he had escaped, and was now wandering about the country with perfect impunity. What was to be done in such cases, therefore, he thought it was expedient some arrangement should be made for the safe custody of the offenders. Such cases, however, were of rare occurrence in comparison with those minor cruelties to which he wished particularly to direct the attention of the House, and which had been now so frequent as to be known under the appellation of "Cassidy cases." The number of cases in which cruel usage had been inflicted on board ship from January, 1857, to June, 1858, was no less than 120, while from the latter month to January, 1859, the number had been 80; the number in the [illegible] from June, 1858, to March, 1859, having been no less than 32. The Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress had also published a report on the subject, which showed how great was the evil of which he complained. No one could deny that these cases were producing the most injurious effect upon the British and American navies by cultivation, from the humanity with which they were attended, feelings of severity and ferocity, of which they had been examples, owing to men being brought to the scaffold. It was, on the other hand, the duty of part of the American Government and the American people that the evil should be remedied. The New-York Commercial Advertiser in a recent number, said:

"The subject of the report is important. The hallucinating [illegible] of this country and Great Britain should [illegible] to prevent this [illegible]."

[illegible], the distinguished American [illegible], in a letter, expressed the same [illegible] in one of two directions [illegible] giving additional powers to American consuls [illegible] with the United States [illegible] Mr. Milner, however, was not in favor of the offer [illegible] English soil. He hoped he might not be [illegible] technicalities, but that Her Majesty's Government would see whether, without [illegible] of international law, that law might not be so supplemented as to prevent the evil which now existed. The giving additional powers to the consuls would naturally occur to any [illegible] who investigated the subject. It was true that [illegible] practice of the English nation to refuse [illegible] power to any body of foreign [illegible] within the kingdom; at the same time, in that respect we had acted exceptionally to the rest of Europe. The law during [illegible] was not so [illegible] to protect the rights of property and civilization [illegible] Mr. Milner thought that it was contended that no [illegible] was only [illegible] in 1842. He thought that by some extension of power they might enable the American consuls to judge the more simple and more frequent of those cases. The hope he might be told that other [illegible] Europe. The American nation, accused to the [illegible] convention with France, had been greatly [illegible] the giving power to the consuls was not [illegible] he did not see why they could not [illegible] in arrangement with the United States by [illegible] which he instanced by the native tribunals of this country and America. It might not do to [illegible] the power to consuls, but it might be made [illegible] which would come ordinarily [illegible] or one other Her Majesty's Government could negotiate with the United States, and in letting the matter in a satisfactory manner perform at the only [illegible] of humanity but of justice. [Hear, hear.] Mr. Milner concluded by moving that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying her Majesty to be graciously pleased to enter into negotiations with the Government of the United States of America, for the purpose of preventing the cruelties and excessive severities of merchant seamen engaged in traffic between this country and the United States, and of bringing to justice the perpetrators of such offences, many of whom escape with impunity, to the injury of the interests of the persons [illegible]

Mr. J. [illegible] thought this subject, under the consideration of the House, had done great service to the country and to a portion of the community of the United States. But the territorial law of England was not sufficient to deal with such offences as the honorable member had described to the House. No country claimed a jurisdiction over crimes committed on board the ships of another country except by treaty, and the Crown of England had no power or jurisdiction over offences committed on board American ships on the high seas. It was only by specific conventions with the United States that such a jurisdiction could arise. In the treaty concluded with the United States by Lord Ashburton in 1842, there was an article that stipulated for the mutual extradition of criminals. It included persons charged with murder, assaults with intent to murder, robbery, arson, forgery, and uttering forged papers. When a murder, or an assault with intent to murder, is committed on board an American ship, on the high seas, it is by the construction of the law supposed to be committed on American territory, if the ship put into an English port, and the offender were claimed through the American Ministry, he would be delivered up and sent to America for trial, and the witnesses in the case were required to be sent with him. In practice it was found that this process was rarely carried into effect, and did not lead to the punishment of offenders. Thus, however, was the course under the existing conventions, and if it was not pursued the offender could not be made amenable, any more than if he had committed the crime on the soil of the United States. The question then arose whether it was possible to make any convention with the United States by which this class of criminals could be brought to punishment. One obvious means of effecting this object would be to extend the number of crimes specified in the article of the treaty of extradition, and include these cases of murder and aggravated assaults on board ship. But under this article, the remedy, on account of the necessity of sending the witnesses to America, was difficult, expensive and rarely resorted to. Another course suggested was to obtain a jurisdiction over these offences in this country, giving the United States a corresponding jurisdiction over English sailors committing similar crimes on board English ships. This would be in the power of the two nations to agree to by Convention; and, if the Government of the United States were willing to agree to such an arrangement, he saw no injury in it to either nation. [Hear, hear.] This would overcome the difficulty caused by each country exercising an exclusive jurisdiction over its own ships on the high seas. Another course suggested was to give the Consuls of each country a jurisdiction in these cases. He was not prepared to say that even that plan, if the two Governments agreed to it, and Parliament gave it effect, would not be carried into a treaty with the United States; but he (the Attorney-General) did not think that the consequence would at all follow, because in the case of the United States the bargain that might be entered into would be in accordance with our inalienable claim to reciprocity of jurisdiction, and that involved the administration of a criminal law similar to our own, and founded on the same principles as our own. The Americans had conventions with France on this subject, and the representations that had been made to the Government of the manner in which the authority established by those conventions were exercised would surprise the House, and would be a warning against the adoption of any similar rule in this country. [Hear, hear.] Nothing was more common than for the captain of an American merchant vessel, on entering a French port, to go immediately to his own consul and accuse his whole ship's crew of mutiny, and have them imprisoned, in order that he might keep them in safe custody until he intended to sail again, when the crew was delivered up to him on board. He mentioned that on the authority of our own consul. There were three things to which he hoped, if this address were voted, the attention of the authorities would be directed. One was the facilitation of the working of the Extradition Act which, for the reasons mentioned by his right honorable friend the Home Secretary, did not answer the object for which it was passed; the other was the establishment of a reciprocity of jurisdiction with reference to the offences that had been mentioned; and the third was the establishment, if possible, of a summary jurisdiction in order to dispose of those quarrels that arose with regard to contracts between British seamen and their employers on their arrival at a foreign port, and similarly with regard to foreign seamen on their arrival at an English port. He earnestly hoped that some mutual understanding might be entered into, and some wise rule adopted on this subject with other nations.

Mr. MILNER thanked the House and the Government for the consideration they had given to the subject, adding that he had no doubt the discussion which had taken place would materially promote the humane object he had in view.

The London Times thus comments (Aug. 2) on the subject:

"Suppose a ship to leave one of the most distant ports in the world for Liverpool or New-York,—suppose it to toss on the ocean for some four months, now beaten by storms off Cape Horn, now becalmed with the pitch seething in its crevices on the Equator,—suppose the master to be an ill-conditioned, passionate, illiterate brute, with just mind enough to work the reckoning when he is sober, and totally irresistible when he is drunk. Suppose this person, under the impulse generated by despotic power and brandy, to take a violent dislike to a particular seaman, perhaps a little less active than his fellows, or a little more proud and touchy, or accused of Methodism, or in any way obnoxious to the skipper's anger,—what is likely to be the life of this unhappy man while his tyrant is on blue water, without any control but the fear of mutiny or the indistinct prospect of an inquiry after reaching port? The annals of the Liverpool Police-courts and Hospitals will answer the question. It would really seem that certain crimes, like diseases, burst out and rage for a time without any obvious cause, for, though violence on the part of the masters of merchantmen to those under their command has always been a lamentable fact, still the evil has increased so much within the last few years, and the injuries inflicted have been so unprecedentedly severe, that it is difficult to penetrate the mystery. The whole question was made the subject of a motion by Mr. M. Milner last night in the House of Commons. Unfortunately, it is more easy to point out the evil and call down the indignation of an audience than to propose a remedy. That, unless some remedy be applied, crews will be tempted to take the law into their own hands, and the merchant service become still more demoralized, is pretty certain; but nothing was suggested last night to which there are not many and strong objections. It seems beyond a doubt that the Americans are the worst offenders. Whether it be climate, or a growing habit of lawlessness arising from the impunity which attend deeds of violence, or whether it be the disregard which American captains, and perhaps American juries, have for the lives of foreign sailors and men with dusky skins, seems it is that the American captains permit themselves a latitude of cruelty which exceeds that of any other nation. We do not intend to defend any cruelty. "Cassidy" or Samuel Hamilton, who was twenty-two years for the master of a poor creature whose teeth he had driven down his throat with a marlin-spike and whose ribs he had broken with a capstan-bar, was an Englishman, and so was each of his mates. But the Americans are more readily men of blood, as the smallest provocation the pistol or the knife is made use of, and even in Liverpool Docks a sailor was the other day pursued into the river by the captain, revolver in hand.

"These cases already determination in England to repress these atrocities as far as it is in our power. The Liverpool magistrates do their best to protect the foreign seamen from the injuries of the masters of the vessels in which they are employed. Now, the Government of the United States had expressed through their consul, a desire that some inquiry should take place into the matter, while on the other hand, the people of Liverpool had taken up the subject with a warmth because the wrong of Englishmen. Yet it did not appear that Her Majesty's Government had taken any steps to bring the perpetrators of those crimes to justice. Mr. Bunsen, a Liverpool merchant, had addressed a pamphlet to the honorable member for Bedford, setting forth the evils which at present prevailed in that respect, and the honorable member had intended to bring the question under the notice of the House. He had, however, since joined the Government, and had by the acceptance of office, it would seem, become incapacitated from being of any use out of his own department in the House or in the country. [Hear, hear.] Mr. M. Milner had, however, deemed it to be his duty to take the question up, and he should at once proceed to inform the House that the grievances of which he complained divided themselves into two [illegible]. The first branch embraced those offences which came within the operation of the treaty of extradition existing between the United States and the United States, and he could assure the House that even in the case of those the current [illegible] of crimes the arrangements were so complicated that it was almost impossible to bring the perpetrators to justice. An outrage which had been committed on board the ship Emma had, for instance, been brought before Baron Bazewell last year, and, in consequence of its having taken place two miles and a half beyond what he considered the jurisdiction of Great Britain, he had not decide on the case, while the offender was handed over to the American Consul, who transported him, together with the witnesses, to the United States; but the moment he had reached his native shore the witnesses absconded, and he escaped punishment. Two cases of a somewhat similar nature had occurred within a very brief period, and within the last month a murder had been committed on board the American ship Montezumer, which had arrived at Amsterdam from New-Orleans via Amsterdam. The mate, however, had some work to get the perpetrator of the murder kept in proper custody, and had applied to the American Consul on the subject, who in his turn had addressed an application to the magistrates of Sunderland for the use of a cell in which the criminal might be confined, undertaking to pay the necessary expenses. The master had eventually brought under the notice of the right honorable the Secretary for the Home Department, and it was then that the request of the Consul was at last complied with. The consequence had been that the criminal had escaped a few days after, and had been recaptured by the people of Sunderland; but he had escaped, and was now wandering about the country with perfect impunity. What was to be done in such cases, therefore, he thought it was expedient some arrangement should be made for the safe custody of the offenders. Such cases, however, were of rare occurrence in comparison with those minor cruelties to which he wished particularly to direct the attention of the House, and which had been now so frequent as to be known under the appellation of "Cassidy cases." The number of cases in which cruel usage had been inflicted on board ship from January, 1857, to June, 1858, was no less than 120, while from the latter month to January, 1859, the number had been 80; the number in the [illegible] from June, 1858, to March, 1859, having been no less than 32. The Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress had also published a report on the subject, which showed how great was the evil of which he complained. No one could deny that these cases were producing the most injurious effect upon the British and American navies by cultivation, from the humanity with which they were attended, feelings of severity and ferocity, of which they had been examples, owing to men being brought to the scaffold. It was, on the other hand, the duty of part of the American Government and the American people that the evil should be remedied. The New-York Commercial Advertiser in a recent number, said:

"The subject of the report is important. The hallucinating [illegible] of this country and Great Britain should [illegible] to prevent this [illegible]."

[illegible], the distinguished American [illegible], in a letter, expressed the same [illegible] in one of two directions [illegible] giving additional powers to American consuls [illegible] with the United States [illegible] Mr. Milner, however, was not in favor of the offer [illegible] English soil. He hoped he might not be [illegible] technicalities, but that Her Majesty's Government would see whether, without [illegible] of international law, that law might not be so supplemented as to prevent the evil which now existed. The giving additional powers to the consuls would naturally occur to any [illegible] who investigated the subject. It was true that [illegible] practice of the English nation to refuse [illegible] power to any body of foreign [illegible] within the kingdom; at the same [illegible] in that respect we had acted exceptionally to the rest of Europe. The law during [illegible] was not so [illegible] to protect the rights of property and civilization [illegible] Mr. Milner thought that it was contended that no [illegible] was only [illegible] in 1842. He thought that by some extension of power they might enable the American consuls to judge the more simple and more frequent of those cases. The hope he might be told that other [illegible] Europe. The American nation, accused to the [illegible] convention with France, had been greatly [illegible] the giving power to the consuls was not [illegible] he did not see why they could not [illegible] in arrangement with the United States by [illegible] which he instanced by the native tribunals of this country and America. It might not do to [illegible] the power to consuls, but it might be made [illegible] which would come ordinarily [illegible] or one other Her Majesty's Government could negotiate with the United States, and in letting the matter in a satisfactory manner perform at the only [illegible] of humanity but of justice. [Hear, hear.] Mr. Milner concluded by moving that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying her Majesty to be graciously pleased to enter into negotiations with the Government of the United States of America, for the purpose of preventing the cruelties and excessive severities of merchant seamen engaged in traffic between this country and the United States, and of bringing to justice the perpetrators of such offences, many of whom escape with impunity, to the injury of the interests of the persons [illegible]

Mr. J. [illegible] thought this subject, under the consideration of the House, had done great service to the country and to a portion of the community of the United States. But the territorial law of England was not sufficient to deal with such offences as the honorable member had described to the House. No country claimed a jurisdiction over crimes committed on board the ships of another country except by treaty, and the Crown of England had no power or jurisdiction over offences committed on board American ships on the high seas. It was only by specific conventions with the United States that such a jurisdiction could arise. In the treaty concluded with the United States by Lord Ashburton in 1842, there was an article that stipulated for the mutual extradition of criminals. It included persons charged with murder, assaults with intent to murder, robbery, arson, forgery, and uttering forged papers. When a murder, or an assault with intent to murder, is committed on board an American ship, on the high seas, it is by the construction of the law supposed to be committed on American territory, if the ship put into an English port, and the offender were claimed through the American Ministry, he would be delivered up and sent to America for trial, and the witnesses in the case were required to be sent with him. In practice it was found that this process was rarely carried into effect, and did not lead to the punishment of offenders. Thus, however, was the course under the existing conventions, and if it was not pursued the offender could not be made amenable, any more than if he had committed the crime on the soil of the United States. The question then arose whether it was possible to make any convention with the United States by which this class of criminals could be brought to punishment. One obvious means of effecting this object would be to extend the number of crimes specified in the article of the treaty of extradition, and include these cases of murder and aggravated assaults on board ship. But under this article, the remedy, on account of the necessity of sending the witnesses to America, was difficult, expensive and rarely resorted to. Another course suggested was to obtain a jurisdiction over these offences in this country, giving the United States a corresponding jurisdiction over English sailors committing similar crimes on board English ships. This would be in the power of the two nations to agree to by Convention; and, if the Government of the United States were willing to agree to such an arrangement, he saw no injury in it to either nation. [Hear, hear.] This would overcome the difficulty caused by each country exercising an exclusive jurisdiction over its own ships on the high seas. Another course suggested was to give the Consuls of each country a jurisdiction in these cases. He was not prepared to say that even that plan, if the two Governments agreed to it, and Parliament gave it effect, would not be carried into a treaty with the United States; but he (the Attorney-General) did not think that the consequence would at all follow, because in the case of the United States the bargain that might be entered into would be in accordance with our inalienable claim to reciprocity of jurisdiction, and that involved the administration of a criminal law similar to our own, and founded on the same principles as our own. The Americans had conventions with France on this subject, and the representations that had been made to the Government of the manner in which the authority established by those conventions were exercised would surprise the House, and would be a warning against the adoption of any similar rule in this country. [Hear, hear.] Nothing was more common than for the captain of an American merchant vessel, on entering a French port, to go immediately to his own consul and accuse his whole ship's crew of mutiny, and have them imprisoned, in order that he might keep them in safe custody until he intended to sail again, when the crew was delivered up to him on board. He mentioned that on the authority of our own consul. There were three things to which he hoped, if this address were voted, the attention of the authorities would be directed. One was the facilitation of the working of the Extradition Act which, for the reasons mentioned by his right honorable friend the Home Secretary, did not answer the object for which it was passed; the other was the establishment of a reciprocity of jurisdiction with reference to the offences that had been mentioned; and the third was the establishment, if possible, of a summary jurisdiction in order to dispose of those quarrels that arose with regard to contracts between British seamen and their employers on their arrival at a foreign port, and similarly with regard to foreign seamen on their arrival at an English port. He earnestly hoped that some mutual understanding might be entered into, and some wise rule adopted on this subject with other nations.

Mr. MILNER thanked the House and the Government for the consideration they had given to the subject, adding that he had no doubt the discussion which had taken place would materially promote the humane object he had in view.

The London Times thus comments (Aug. 2) on the subject:

"Suppose a ship to leave one of the most distant ports in the world for Liverpool or New-York,—suppose it to toss on the ocean for some four months, now beaten by storms off Cape Horn, now becalmed with the pitch seething in its crevices on the Equator,—suppose the master to be an ill-conditioned, passionate, illiterate brute, with just mind enough to work the reckoning when he is sober, and totally irresistible when he is drunk. Suppose this person, under the impulse generated by despotic power and brandy, to take a violent dislike to a particular seaman, perhaps a little less active than his fellows, or a little more proud and touchy, or accused of Methodism, or in any way obnoxious to the skipper's anger,—what is likely to be the life of this unhappy man while his tyrant is on blue water, without any control but the fear of mutiny or the indistinct prospect of an inquiry after reaching port? The annals of the Liverpool Police-courts and Hospitals will answer the question. It would really seem that certain crimes, like diseases, burst out and rage for a time without any obvious cause, for, though violence on the part of the masters of merchantmen to those under their command has always been a lamentable fact, still the evil has increased so much within the last few years, and the injuries inflicted have been so unprecedentedly severe, that it is difficult to penetrate the mystery. The whole question was made the subject of a motion by Mr. M. Milner last night in the House of Commons. Unfortunately, it is more easy to point out the evil and call down the indignation of an audience than to propose a remedy. That, unless some remedy be applied, crews will be tempted to take the law into their own hands, and the merchant service become still more demoralized, is pretty certain; but nothing was suggested last night to which there are not many and strong objections. It seems beyond a doubt that the Americans are the worst offenders. Whether it be climate, or a growing habit of lawlessness arising from the impunity which attend deeds of violence, or whether it be the disregard which American captains, and perhaps American juries, have for the lives of foreign sailors and men with dusky skins, seems it is that the American captains permit themselves a latitude of cruelty which exceeds that of any other nation. We do not intend to defend any cruelty. "Cassidy" or Samuel Hamilton, who was twenty-two years for the master of a poor creature whose teeth he had driven down his throat with a marlin-spike and whose ribs he had broken with a capstan-bar, was an Englishman, and so was each of his mates. But the Americans are more readily men of blood, as the smallest provocation the pistol or the knife is made use of, and even in Liverpool Docks a sailor was the other day pursued into the river by the captain, revolver in hand.

"These cases already determination in England to repress these atrocities as far as it is in our power. Wood, in conclusion, moved [illegible] enabling the Government to raise in the [illegible] Kingdom, for the service of the Government of [illegible] which, after some remarks by Mr. Bright, was agreed to, and the Bill read a second time.

[illegible] AT SEA ON BOARD OF AMERICAN SHIPS.

In the House of Commons, Friday evening, Mr. H. MUSCROVE MILNER opened an important discussion on this subject, suggesting official [illegible] by Her Majesty's Government to effect such arrangements with the United States as might put a stop to the existing condition of things.

Mr. Milner, from [illegible], pursuant to notice, to move an address to Her Majesty, praying that she might be graciously pleased to take steps to prevent the atrocities which were committed on board American ships on the high seas. The honorable gentleman, in doing so, said the subject was one which had excited the attention of large bodies of men throughout the country, and had involved the question of much injury to British property, and many crimes allowed to go unpunished. The point which he wished the House to consider in connection with this subject was, whether it would be best to take to precedent in the case of these cruel outrages committed on the high seas in vessels engaged in the merchant traffic between England and the United States. These outrages had in a special manner drawn the attention of the inhabitants of Liverpool, which was the great outport of that traffic. It was well by them that unhappy men arrived almost daily in their harbors who, in consequence of the cruel treatment they had received on the voyage, were obliged to be conveyed to the hospitals of the city, where some of them died of the injuries which were inflicted upon them, while others remained there for a long time convalescent. Now, the Government of the United States had expressed through their consul, a desire that some inquiry should take place into the matter, while on the other hand, the people of Liverpool had taken up the subject with a warmth because the wrong of Englishmen. Yet it did not appear that Her Majesty's Government had taken any steps to bring the perpetrators of those crimes to justice. [illegible] AUSTRIA.

The latest London correspondence from Vienna [illegible] very unfriendly feeling towards Russia [illegible] but the wrath of the Austrians is [illegible] The promise of the Emperor of [illegible] his army and navy on a peace foot- [illegible] most eminent statesmen and the journals of the world, but none greater than politicians who have not yet forgotten the repeated assurances [illegible] Lord Cowley that France was not arming, "as the object of His Majesty," says a dispatch, "is to give the czar's pretensions an victory by refusing to grant the money necessary for continuing the armaments."

On the 1st of August a military commission, which [illegible] of the most distinguished Austrian officers will meet here. The Austrians have had good [illegible] enough to remark that the organization of their army is in several respects faulty, and they have [illegible] to make the necessary changes without delay. The arms of the soldiers and the artillery [illegible] improved, the number of Jäger battalions increased to 40, the strength of the regiments of the line diminished, &c. It is stated that Count Stadion, who commanded the reserve cavalry of the first army on the 24th of June, has been condemned by a court-martial to imprisonment in a fortress for two years, but it is hoped that it will be pardoned sooner. Count Stadion is a young officer, but he had been very brave and enterprising officer, but he had been [illegible] extremely from nervous headache for some [illegible] before the battle of Solferino was fought. Baron [illegible] who was sent to blame, and the military world is astonished that he was permitted to escape without severe punishment. By "special favor" of His Majesty he was allowed to quit the army without retaining his military rank."

THE HUNGARIANS AND AUSTRIA—LETTER FROM BARTHOLOMEW SZENTKIRALY.

From the Paris Pays, Aug. 1.

MR. EDITOR:—The more our patriotic sensibility has been wounded by the absolute silence which the French Press has preserved concerning Hungary since after the past ten years, the more did I regret of putting your article of to-day, which at last does us clothing justice. You have justly characterized the Hungarian movement in saying that it was not revolutionary but purely national, and you might have added, purely constitutional.

To prove this, I need only refer you to an extract from the memoir which some of my countrymen and myself presented to the President of the French Republic in 1852, at the time when Austria desired to enter into the Germanic Confederation, with her Hungarian and Italian provinces. Actual events show very clearly with what motive Austria connected this project, which we resisted, but fortunately thwarted.

In this memoir we have enumerated, one by one, the constitutional guarantees which ought to be for us as a barrier against the encroachments of absolute power. The first of these guarantees was the solemn act which we call the Pragmatic Sanction, which contains, sanctioned by the signature and seal of the King, had which contained the recapitulation of all the fundamental principles of our Constitution, and was a contract, in point of fact, a personal and real [illegible] between the nation and the King. The third is found in the treaties of peace concluded in 1606, 1645, 1664 and 1711, between Hungary and the dynasty—that one of which confirmed anew our national [illegible] and independence, and most of which were [illegible] under the influence and the guarantees of France, England, Sweden and Holland:—so that these treaties ought to be regarded as having all the weight and authority of an international act. The fourth guarantee is found in our whole code, which contains the oaths and the diplomas of all our Kings, the articles of our treaties with the dynasty, and a great number of laws giving the most solemn assurance to restrain on one hand the Royal power, and on the other to protect the liberties of the nation. Article 8 of the treaty of 1715 says "that the King can only govern according to existing laws, or those which may hereafter be made and voted by the Diet,—and that Hungary shall never, consequently, be governed according to the system established in the other countries belonging to Austria." A law of 1790 says that "notwithstanding the changes introduced in the succession by the Pragmatic Sanction, Hungary with the party annexed, remains a free and independent kingdom, so far as the form and system of its government are concerned;—that it is never to be subjected to any other country or nation, but shall always preserve its own Constitution, and shall constantly be governed and administered by kings legally crowned,—not according to the example of other countries, but according to its own laws and customs."

After having cited these four guarantees, we reason thus in our Memoir. I quote:

"It is then incontestable that after having obtained so many assurances and guarantees, we had the right to demand from the Sanctioner respect for our national independence and our Constitution sanctioned by our laws, consecrated by treaties and sworn to by all our kings. Even when in 1804 Francis I. took the title of Emperor of Austria, he made, in his proclamation of August 15, 1804, a voluntary declaration before all Europe in these words, 'Our kingdoms, principalities and provinces preserve unchanged their titles, constitutions and prerogatives,—especially in this the case with the kingdom of Hungary;—the constitutions shall be hereafter precisely what they have been hitherto, for us and our predecessors, as kings of Hungary.'"

But perhaps we may be asked if the position of Hungary towards Austria has not been completely changed by the events of 1848 and 1849. To this question we reply:

1. That the reforms which took place in 1848 were not the result of revolutionary measures, but were adopted and introduced by the most legal forms, discussed and voted by the two Chambers, consented to and sanctioned by the King. The arrival at Vienna of a Hungarian deputation, composed of about 100 members, and charged by the two Chambers with laying before the king the wishes and complaints of the country, cannot be characterized as an act of violence, especially when, three weeks afterwards, the same King went of his own accord to Pressburg to sanction in person the laws to which he had given his consent in Vienna,—and all this while legal order and tranquility reigned throughout Hungary.

2. That although by the laws of 1848 the names of certain public functions were changed, those laws did not in any respect alter the relations of Hungary to Austria, and were only the confirmation of rights already guaranteed by all our ancient laws.

3. That the nation took arms only after Austria had invaded its territory by JELLACHICH, one of the high officers of the country, who, thus aided and pushed on by the Court at Vienna, rebelled against the existing laws.

4. That when, after the invasion of Hungary by the Austrian army in December, 1848, the two Chambers sent to Prince WINDISCHGRATZ, Commander-in-Chief, messengers of peace, he not only refused to receive them, but caused them to be arrested, and one of them, Count LOUIS DE BATHYANY, in spite of the sacredness of his mission, was condemned to be hung.

5. That Hungary has never asked anything more than the maintenance of what they possessed,—of that which existed legally,—the maintenance of her ancient Constitution, of her liberty, of her national independence, of her rights, and her laws confirmed, sanctioned and sworn to by the Hapsburgh dynasty,—which made war upon us solely to overturn the Constitution we had enjoyed for ten centuries.

It was Hungary, therefore, which was conservative—which was the defender of established laws—and it is the Austrian dynasty which rebelled against that law. Hungary was merely defending herself; it was Austria which imposed the war upon us—which we accepted, but from which we could not avoid it.

In these few words, Sir, you have the whole case. Hungary stood steadily upon legal, historical, constitutional ground. It was love of country, the sentiment of national independence and attachment to freedom which created an army 150,000 strong, and which drove back the Austrians victoriously to the gates of Vienna. They were only saved by the Russians.

If there is any people in the world who love liberty and cling to their nationality, it is certainly the Hungarians. For ten centuries they enjoyed freedom and independence as a nation—they know, therefore, how to appreciate them. I believe, also, that there is only one way of keeping them, and that is by restoring to them their sanctioned by no mere centuries. Upon this condition only is there any possibility of a peaceful and [illegible] between Hungary and the Austrian dynasty. As the house has to be free under that dynasty in the past, I hope she will know it in the future also.

BARTHOLOMEW DE SZENTKIRALY,
Late Minister-President of Hungary.

PARIS, July 28, 1859.

The London Times thus discourses on the quarrel of severity between Prussia and Austria:

In these days to discount rather prematurely those draughts which our forefathers used to draw upon posterity. Whatever doubt may hang over the present, and however inscrutable may be the future, we seem come to know all that can be known of the past. Time was when a State paper only struggled into light after the lapse of a couple of generations, and when half-a-dozen gentlemen could circumscribe all their lives at the wild guesses of the rest of the human race as to the causes and details of events which had materially molded the fortunes of mankind. But now publicity has become a great power, and public opinion, which is the sturdy son of publicity, goes forth casting down and settling up all things, pleasing all the time a better mortality, and more frequent sympathies than were ever acknowledged by little cliques of diplomatists. The statesman or the diplomatist, who should, in this year of grace, 1859, neglect to convince the world that he is right, would be like the military man who should pooh, pooh the strict science of the naval man who should leave out of his calculations the invention of steam. Honesty or dishonesty, for truth or for falsehood, to inspire a well-grounded confidence, or to lure to a false security, to inform or to deceive, all when knowledge power now address themselves to the multitude.

Upon this we draw the great question of State [illegible] Shall we [illegible] the affairs of the world? Shall we become a democracy? Who shall [illegible] the interests of the people? A well-answer on [illegible] for cutting the popularity of two unremunerative [illegible] and then up in a room together and let their quarrel out without witnesses [illegible] very much the plan with Prussia and Austria, and the common consultation Austria. When the door was unlocked, the two statesmen were found sitting at the same table, excellent friends, but in very ill-humor with the rest of the world. After their loud challenges they were a little ashamed of the peaceful position in which they were so evidently discovered, and each felt bound to find excuses for the [illegible] assassination of so much mortal anger. France had been basely deserted by England, and had been threatened by Prussia and all the rest of Continental Europe. Austria had also been deserted by England, and had and been properly pitted by Prussia. But much worse than this, the "natural" allies of Austria—the anti-Russian, Prussian and Russian—had joined together to extort from Austria worse terms than those which were offered by the Emperor of the French. Thus in a way, then, smoothing to the Austrian vanity, the Emperor of the French, with arms in his hands and three victories at his back, was inclined to do less for Italy than the much-maligned neutral Powers. Therefore Austria, as she affirmed, very prudently yielded her sword to her more reasonable adversary. This version is now contested by two of the incriminated Powers. The Russian Government flatly contradicts the statement of the Austrian official papers, and authoritatively declares that when the treaty of Villafranca was signed no basis of mediation had been discussed, and that even the preliminary question of the expediency of mediating had not been settled. England, and incidentally Prussia, speak out upon the same subject by the publication of a dispatch from Lord JOHN RUSSELL to the British Minister at Berlin. Lord JOHN RUSSELL, in this dispatch, tells an unvarnished and, indeed, a somewhat prosy tale, of how Count BERNSTORFF came to him from his superiors in the Prussian Government, and communicated to him the great and very natural desire on the part of Prussia that England and the Czar should join her in putting an end to "the effusion of blood," but that a great quantity of vague language, when tested by further questioning, only came to this, "that Prussia could not propose to Austria any alienation of territory, but only reforms and changes in modes "of administration." To this proposition Lord JOHN RUSSELL replied by an exposition of the views and policy of England on this Italian question. So far from thinking that in case of mediation the neutral Powers could not propose to Austria any alienation of territory, Lord JOHN declared it to be the opinion of his Government that "no termination of the war should be expected without some cession of territory on the part of Austria." So far from confining himself to the mild hope of Count BERNSTORFF, that "the treaties which bind Austria to exercise a sort of protectorate over certain Italian States may be replaced by a better system," Lord JOHN asserts it to be the firm persuasion of the English Government that "an Italy in which the people should be the free citizens of a free country would strengthen and "confirm the balance of power." Lord JOHN also indulged his natural bent, and taken advantage of the opportunity to read the Prussian Court a few Whig apophthegms somewhat trite in their character and loose in their application. He insists, however, that, in addition to some cession of territory by Austria, there must be, to complete any settlement of Italy, a permanent reform in the administration of the States of the Church. He thinks, moreover, that Austria committed "an act of extreme imprudence" when she began the war and invaded Piedmont, and he considers that act as a forfeiture of the rights conferred upon her by the treaties of 1814.

This is, no doubt, a declaration of moral hostility on the part of England to the usurpations of Austria in Italy, and it derives increased significance from the admission that these views had already been communicated to the Emperor of the French. Austria might, indeed, well suspect, if this document came to her knowledge, that she could have little hope of saving Venetia through the mediation of the Cabinet which had put forth this State paper. But whatever may be its purport as declaring the views of England, this dispatch goes but a short way to justify the declaration of the Austrian Emperor, that he had acquiesced in an undesirable peace because the terms of that peace, undesirable as they were, and offered as they were at the sword's point, were still more favorable than those which were pressed upon him by his allies. This assertion is now contradicted by Russia, is disproved in respect of Prussia, and is not quite true even as regards England. Russia now declares that she had done nothing at all towards settling the basis of any accommodation, and Prussia had declined to advise any cession of territory. Some persons less confiding than we are might still suspect some mystery in this matter. It cannot be that the Emperor of Austria, even in the bitterness of those first few moments that followed the cession of an Austrian province, should have publicly stated to Europe that which he did not think to be true. Must we believe that NAPOLEON III. at Villafranca was too clever for FRANCIS JOSEPH? Must we understand that the Emperor of Austria when he signed that treaty believed in dangers from Russia and Prussia which did not really exist, and was thus deceived to his own good? We see no other way of reconciling the manifestoes of the lately belligerent Powers with the statements of the neutral nations. But, however this may be, the relative position of Austria and Prussia after the publication of this State paper will be somewhat analogous to that which existed between Austria and Russia at the close of the Russian war. Russia then thought that she had been deserted by her natural allies, and, after she had sullenly yielded, was more resentful against her unstable friends than against her active foes. It has now so happened, or has been so contrived, that Austria is in just the same humor to enjoy any future humiliation of Prussia as Russia was the other day to take pleasure in the humiliation of Austria. Prussia, doubtless, will look to this. For ourselves, we are only occupied with this question so far as it is right to ascertain the public facts of the age in which we write, and to collect the various testimony of the great actors in the great European misunderstanding.

A late Viennese letter says:

"The Hanoverians are also agitating in favor of a German Parliament, but the political ferment which has been brought about by the hastily concluded peace will soon subside if it is seen that Austria has neither sacrificed Germany nor intends to forsake her. This Government has, however, lost much ground in Germany, and it can only recover it by judicious internal reforms, and by the introduction of a system which is more in keeping with the spirit of the times. The general public appears to know nothing of what is passing here, but the few are well aware that a violent struggle is now going on between the Reformers and Retrogradists. Some persons who are attached to the person of the Emperor thought it fit to make an attack on Baron BACH, who thereupon tendered his resignation. That it was not accepted need hardly be said. There is again a question of the dismissal of several of His Majesty's official advisers, and of the re-formation of a Ministry of War, under the direction of the Archduke ALBRECHT. It is whispered that Baron WOLKENSTEIN, a member of the Council of the Empire, is likely to succeed Baron BACH, the present Minister of the Interior. On the 20th inst. the King of Bavaria opened the Diet in person, and recommended peace being restored—to direct its attention to internal affairs. The Royal speech was not very full of matter, but it must have given great satisfaction to the representatives of the Bavarian nation, as every word of it proves that His Majesty is attached to the Constitution, and is resolved to maintain it. It is stated that M. von BEHRENS SCHOMBURGER, the bugbear of the Austrians, is to return to Frankfort, and that M. von UXKOLL is to have some other diplomatic appointment. On the 21st the German Diet unanimously seconded the motions of Austria and Prussia that the Federal contingents and fortresses should be placed on a peace footing.

A few days ago Prince EULENBURG received telegraphic instructions to go from London to St. Cloud to congratulate the Emperor of the French on his safe arrival.

The Grand Duke LEOPOLD is now pleading an alibi. He was not with his son with the Austrian staff at Solferino; he was quite elsewhere, viz: at Voeslau, a small village near Vienna. The Times correspondent only saw his ghost or "double." As to Modena, that Duke brazens it out, and talks of having still 4,000 men in Verona, with which he means to march on his revolted territory and restore "order."

AUSTRIA.

The Times' Vienna correspondent says that, although Count COLLOREDO had an audience of the Emperor on the 28th of July, and was long closeted with the Minister for Foreign Affairs, he is not likely to leave for Zurich until the beginning of the coming week. For a time a very unfriendly feeling toward England prevailed here, but the wrath of the Austrians is rapidly subsiding. The promise of the Emperor of the French to put his army and navy on a peace footing, has made a great impression on the Austrian financial world. The Count DE BONNEVILLE will return here as the representative of France.

RUSSIA.

The following letter has been received from St Petersburg, dated July 15:

"Although the war in Italy was approved by us, in many respects, on account of the unfriendly feeling which prevails here against the Austrian Government, our Emperor has always entertained a friendly feeling towards each belligerent. The Russian army eagerly desired war with Austria, and the Guard had been apprised that in place of forming the reserve, as usual, it should be the first engaged. One corps d'armée had been concentrated in Podolia, and another in Bessarabia. These demonstrations, however, were more apparent than real, and I have reason to know that the Russian Government has contributed to the peace just concluded. Our Minister of Foreign Affairs had his plan of mediation, which would have shortly been brought forward."

The Russian screw liner Retvizan, of 84 guns, Capt. Baron TOWE, and screw frigate Gremetes, of 50 guns, Capt. YEMELIANOFF, which had lately put into Cadiz, from Smyrna and Messina, on their way to the Baltic, left on the 16th, without having been admitted to pratique by the Board of Health.

The Emperor ALEXANDER has established a Commission to draw up a military code for the purpose of remedying domestic abuses in the army. The Commission will consist of General NARO-KOUSCZEKY, Lieut. General FOUNIE, and Major-Generals ENGELHARD, MARKOF and TOMASWSKY. The day that the monument to his father NICHOLAS I., was inaugurated, the Czar [illegible] the sum of 8,328,000 roubles to the fund for the relief of invalids and veterans.

The Russian fleet has been enlarged during the first six months of the current year by five new screw line-of-battle ships, exclusive of the General Admiral, built in America.

Three corps d'armée mobilized for the war are put on the peace footing. The fifth corps will, however, for the present, remain on the war establishment.

The Russian organ, Le Nord, has three times at Brussels insisted on the fortresses of Mantua and [illegible] as the capital of the new Italian [illegible] of Venetia, being exclusively garrisoned by native regiments of the Austrian Confederation.

The semi-official Correspondencia Autógrafa has the following:

"At Gibraltar the English are mounting industrial, as easily, as has been stated, in the facts, but even in the midst of the streets. The day on which the squadron of the Straits shall light his first mines this place shall be transformed into a volcano of gunpowder and ball. Our forts of Santa Barbara and San Felipe, destroyed by the English in the War of Independence, under the pretence that the French troops might take possession of them, are now only heaps of ruins, and the team guns with which they were armed are still in the hands of the English. The English will not allow these fortifications to be restored, and yet we permit them to entrench every day, by constructing earthworks on the neutral ground, and by taking the stone destined for their walls from the quarries of San Roque."

The journals announce that new arrests had then made at Seville, also at Badajoz and Olivenza.

Private letters announce that the Spanish Cortes will assemble at the beginning of October, and that Gen. PRIM is to be Governor-General of Cuba in the room of Gen. CONCHA, who has resigned.

THE SHAKESPEARE CONTROVERSY.

If we may believe the Critic, the controversy respecting Mr. COLLIER'S Shakespearian "Emendations" is likely to assume a new and rather startling phase. Mr. PARRY, the alleged former possessor of the celebrated folio, denies that this copy was ever in his possession; that, on the contrary, "it differed in edition, in binding, in corrections—in fact in every particular in which a book can differ—from the folio 'SHAKESPEARE' formerly in his possession." If we are not misinformed, (says our cotemporary,) it is likely that Mr. COLLIER may be called upon to defend the Shakespearian papers at Bridgewater House, once in his possession. It is said that precisely the same observations as to pencil handwriting of a modern character underlying paint or ink writing have been made, and that even a strong similarity in the character has been detected.

PIEDMONT.

Gen. GARIBALDI has issued the following order:

"LUVERI, Tuesday, July 19.

"However political affairs may go in the present circumstances, it is the duty of the Italians not only not to lay down their arms and manifest discouragement, but to swell the ranks, and to show to Europe that, guided by the heroic VICTOR EMANUEL, they are ready again to confront the vicissitudes of war in whatever form they may present themselves."

THE PAPAL STATES.

The Times' correspondent from Rome says that "there is great dissatisfaction here, and I have no hesitation in saying that the French soldiers alone keep down a general outbreak." ST. PETERSBURG, Friday, July 29.

The Journal de St. Petersburg has the following: "The journals, relying upon diplomatic documents, have pretended that the bases of mediation were agreed upon by the neutral Powers prior to the conclusion of the treaty of Villafranca, and that these bases, being especially judged by Austria less favorable than those proposed by France, had determined the Emperor of Austria to accept the latter ones. We are authorized to state that the bases of mediation of which the project lately published is composed, had not been agreed upon by the neutral Powers, nor even discussed. The preliminaries of peace between the belligerents were already signed before the principle of mediation, which formed the object of negotiations between the neutral Powers, was definitely agreed upon." Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The purchase of three steamers (known as the Collins line of steamships) for account of the "Pacific Mail Steamship Company," and the "Panama Railroad Company," and the interest out of these to create a new line to ply between New-York and Aspinwall, in connection with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's steamers on the Pacific Ocean, (and in lieu of the United States Mail Steamship Company's steamers,) has been for weeks noted in the public journals, while the price paid for these three steamers is said to be between $600,000 and $800,000, though nothing positive is apparently known among stockholders, if to all of the directors.

Is it not time to make known to those in interest and for whose account this purchase is made, the object, price and mode of payment, together with the division and proposed employ of such steamers? This purchase, alike in tonnage and cost, involves a large outlay, and light upon the whole transaction would be satisfactory to some, if not many stockholders.

It affords a fitting occasion to assemble all our stockholders; they have not been brought together since May, 1856, though by a resolution in June, 1855 they were required to be assembled annually to learn the state of their accounts for the close of the fiscal year, and take action thereon. An exhibit in prin was made, showing a surplus of assets of $1,302,062 46 over and above capital, on the 2d of May, 1859, and of which over one million dollars was then represented as available.

This omission to assemble stockholders in May, 1859, has been a matter of comment; some controlling reason might have existed for delay; perhaps from negotiations between Commodore VANDERBILT, (the representative of the Nicaragua Company and other boats,) and our Company, then, and these many months, embarked in opposition yet rife, each engaged in transporting steerage passengers for $30 between New-York and San Francisco, paying to the Panama Railroad Company one-half of it, and thus leaving $25 for the steamers upon the Atlantic and Pacific, of each line, for carrying a passenger 3,100 miles between New-York and San Francisco, and feeding them for some twenty-six days! With what profits steamship owners, Commodore VANDERBILT might tell; if he won't, the published records of our Company for 1853, 1854 and 1855 will afford some clue.

The few, rather than the many, at times, may best conduct negotiations under certain circumstances, but this blind faith may continue too long and be carried too far, and the past history of our company best illustrates it, and let us briefly revert in evidence of this.

In 1853, our property was embarked in opposition to that of the Nicaragua Company, and was so continued throughout 1854, and for the first half of 1855.

The stockholders, good natured souls, in blind faith, relied for more than two years upon the significant givings out, that all this Pacific trade was to be there so soon as the Nicaragua Company should be extinguished, and that was ever held up to view as just on the eve of happening.

1853, 1854, and 1855, brought no dividends to stockholders pockets. It so happened in May, 1856, that the managers discovered that the property was in peril, and through committees they invoked the aid of stockholders, who in turn asked to learn the causes of the dilemma.

Our stock, under this master policy of monopolizing all the Pacific trade, was reduced from current value of 100 per cent. in 1853 to 30 per cent. in 1855—that is to say, its capital of $3,000,000 was selling at the rate of $1,000,000. Those in interest will recall it was notorious at that. The Company was indebted for advances considerably above one million of dollars cash, the sequence of opposition fare—and how was it to be met? Their credit was prostrate.

A committee was appointed to examine into the causes of a failure to make dividends, &c., and make their report to an adjourned meeting on the 26th of June, 1856, ascribing it in part to unnecessary investments in steamships, docks, &c., and to excessive unnecessary current expenditures; but mainly to the fact that, for a period of twenty-eight months, the company had been carrying passengers at rates of fare aggregating less than the ordinary current disbursements of their steamships, and that the abatement upon standard rates of passage for that period was $1,001,064 25.

The report was laid upon the table at the meeting of June, 1856, by the force of numbers; complimentary resolutions to the managers were passed, but would not remove the Company's affairs from peril.

The managers were forced to turn over a new leaf, or the fate of the concern was inevitable. Peace had [illegible] with the Nicaragua Company, [illegible] the majority of shares in the Nicaragua Company, [illegible] Commodore VANDERBILT, [illegible] Company, [illegible] Company, [illegible] Company

The New-York Times.

NEW-YORK, SUNDAY, AUGUST 19, 1860.

TERMS OF THE NEW-YORK TIMES.

POINTS OF THE DAY.

[illegible] by the Vanderbilt and City of Manchester are full of varied and interesting matter. The Sardinian representative named by VICTOR EMANUEL, the Chevalier DEL-AMBROSIO, having been received by the Emperor, the excellent correspondents who were sure that Sardinia would be excluded from the Conference at Zurich are sorely disconcerted. From Central Italy it is announced that the peaceable protest of the people of Parma and Modena against the return of their ousted sovereigns, and of the people of Romagna against the violent reestablishment of the Papal [illegible], is daily gathering strength. Preparations are making at Turin and Milan to celebrate the birth of NAPOLEON III, on the 15th of August, [illegible] at Paris.

[illegible] in Religion gives as the ultimatum of [illegible] to our Pope the following conditions: "A complete execution of the reforms proposed by NAPOLEON III. two years ago; a complete civil code; the military conscription and abolition of foreign troops; equal admission of laymen with clerical prelates to all offices of State; a council of state organized on the French basis; and a consultative body of forty members.

The news of a projected meeting between the Czar ALEXANDER and the Prussian Regent at Ems were correct; as well as of an Anglo-Prussian alliance.

The attitude of Austria toward Prussia, Russia and England was decidedly hostile; and an Austrian agitation for a remodeling of the German Confederation was provoking a great deal of ill feeling in Prussia and among the Protestant Germans generally. The Hungarian Constitutionalists were moving for a reconciliation with Austria on the basis of the restoration of the old Constitution of Hungary. Public feeling in France in favor of the peace of Villafranca was steadily increasing; and the official intelligence of the intended disarmament had been received with general approval. In England, Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. COBDEN had taken strong ground against the panic-making of the Press and of the aristocratic party. A serious strike of the whole building trade of London was exciting no little concern. It had been brought to the attention of Parliament by Lord BROUGHAM and Earl GRANVILLE. The Builders' Union had organized this movement, affecting, as Lord BROUGHAM states, "nearly ninety thousand laboring men," for the purpose, as the noble lord put it, of obtaining "ten hours' pay for nine hours' work." From British India come details of the extending revolt of the European troops. At Berhampore the Fifth Regiment had fortified itself in its barracks, elected its own officers, and was defying all authority. The Madras Carbineers had followed this example. Mr. MONCKTON MILNES had moved in Parliament an address to her Majesty, suggesting the propriety of making a convention with the United States, for the purpose of securing adequate punishment for offences committed at sea on board the vessels of either Power. Lord JOHN RUSSELL had informed a deputation of merchants that France and England were preparing to offer their good offices in the affair between Buenos Ayres and the Argentine Confederation. From Spain we learn that Gen. PRIM had been named Captain-General of Cuba, in the room of Gen. CANCHA, resigned. Spain had also authorized the laying of a Transatlantic telegraphic wire, via the Canaries and Cuba, to Brazil. The work was to begin at once under French supervision. The Spanish Government had ordered the guano islands in the vicinity of Cuba to be occupied at once, and the guano shipped to Spain for trial.

The Papal Government has awarded to Mr. EDWARD H. PARKER, of Boston, the sum of $3,400 as damages for the robbery of his party during the Perugia massacre. A telegram, published on Saturday, stated the amount erroneously at $400.

The Illinois Central Committee, charged with the investigation of the frauds upon the State Treasury, report progress. Their labors have not been completed, owing to the difficulty of attaining definite evidence. The history of the Canal fraud remains in the dark, and the theft of papers from Gov. MATTESON'S box is unexplained. The funding of the Macalister and Stebbins frauds in New-York is declared by the Committee to have been an illegal transaction, but further investigation is essential. The Committee propose to continue their investigations up to the 1st of January next, and then to report to the Legislature upon the exact condition of the finances.

A dispatch, from Washington, states that the Mission to Central America has been offered to Gen. CUSHING, but that he has declined it—his engagements not allowing of its acceptance.

A desperate battle is reported to have taken place on the 22d of July, between the Sioux and Arickaree Indians, in which twenty-eight of the former and sixteen of the latter were killed. Another battle was expected, and it was believed that the weakest party would be exterminated.

Gen. BOTTS writes to Gov. BANKS, that bodily infirmity will prevent his being present at the State Encampment of the Massachusetts Militia at Concord.

Dr. BELLOWS has addressed an elaborate letter to the Christian Inquirer, the organ of the Unitarian denomination, in which he "defines his position" on the subject of a "Broad Church." If the definition be as broad as it is long it ought to satisfy everybody, and include all mankind outside of the Cannibal Islands. The Rev. Dr. thinks the "impetuous public" have shown extraordinary instinct in his discourses and doings, and infers therefrom that the subject must possess profound relations with the interior life of the age. We are afraid that the peace of Villafranca, and the extreme hot weather must be counted for something in the "extraordinary interest," which, to these most unpractical, the matter may for a month have seemed to excite in the general mind. The latter is too long for republication.

A fire at the Massachusetts State Reform School, at Westboro', which occasioned the total destruction of that building, on Saturday, was set by a boy, an inmate of the institution. He was discovered and arrested, but too late to prevent the disaster. It is said that repeated attempts have been made by the boys, within the last six months, to burn the building. The loss to the State is estimated at $165,000.

A letter from Miss ELIZABETH STARR, the young lady said to have been enticed into a Toronto nunnery, declares that she entered the Convent of her own free will, intending to take the veil, but, having become disgusted with life in a nunnery, left the premises. She is now at Saratoga, whence she writes this letter, addressed to her father.

The Troy Daily Times asserts that another bridge on the Northern Railroad, not far above the point where the recent terrible disaster occurred, is so rotten as to render travel over it exceedingly dangerous.

Prof. GERMAN ROSS, formerly of this city, lies dangerously ill at Rochester.

The Richmond Grays, to whose soldierly and gentlemanly bearing the members of our Seventh Regiment, who formed an escort for the conveyance of the remains of Ex-President MONROE, in July, 1858, to the capital city of his native State, were so generously indebted for the good treatment which they will ever warmly remember, arrived in this City on Saturday evening, as the guests of that regiment. The reception was worthy of our citizen soldiery, and must have been most flattering to the Grays. Indeed, this visit, among our citizens in general, is one of no ordinary interest, and we may be sure that the sons of the Old Dominion will leave a favorable impression on their return to cherish other than the warmest feelings towards the Empire City. The Mayor of Richmond could not accompany them, as was desired, but will arrive here to-day. Yesterday the Grays, escorted by two divisions of the Second Regiment, visited West Point and Newburgh, and that the hospitalities shown them were duly appreciated, from the Adjutant-General down.

The Mayor of this City, in consequence of the uncertainty of the weather, calling on Saturday noon, exhibits a very gratifying condition of the public health. The total number of deaths was but 561, being but 8 small increase over the week previous. It is evident from this circumstance, that the unpleasant taste of the Croton is not at all unwholesome, or at least not dangerously so. The mortality table shows that of the whole number, 297 were born in the United States, Germany 18, Ireland 112, and the remainder of various foreign countries.

Yesterday, in accordance with the order recently issued by Mr. PILLSWAY, General Superintendent of Police, many of the drinking houses in the City were closed, and, as a general thing, the day was observed with increased propriety.

On Saturday Cotton declined a shade, with very moderate sales. Flour was quite dull, and was lower. Wheat and Corn were also cheaper, yet not very active. The movements in Provisions, Rice, Naval Stores, Oils, Tobacco, Metals and Fish were restricted. A good inquiry prevailed for Rio Coffee and for Brown Sugars. Freights were inactive, with 483 vessels of all classes in port.

Tyranny at Sea.

There are two methods of dealing with every acknowledged evil; the method of prevention and the method of punishment. It is still, perhaps, an open question in morals, which of these methods is likely, in the long run, to prove the more effectious. For there are two schools of theologians equally active, and as we are bound to believe equally conscientious, whose notions on the subject are diametrically opposed; and each of these schools is crowded with reverent and admiring and energetic disciples. But there can be little doubt, we fancy, that it is the duty of statesmen to attack any well-established public evil, when fairly brought under their eyes, with one or both of these methods; and it is equally clear that if circumstances make it difficult or undesirable to apply one particular means of doing away a mischief, no theories or prejudices should be allowed to stand in the way of adopting others.

The abuse of their "little brief authority" by the shipmasters of our American mercantile marine has now fairly earned the rank of a great national calamity and disgrace. Of course, there are multitudes of American captains who treat their seamen honestly and humanely; recognize them as fellow-creatures, and so command their vessel as to combine perfect discipline with a decent regard for the rights and feelings of their subordinates. This no rational man will attempt to question, any more than the converse proposition that multitudes of foreign captains are guilty, whenever chance and position favor them, of brutalities as revolting as any recorded of the old buccaneer or the modern slaver. Let these things pass for granted.

It remains not the less true that the merchant navy of the United States is especially fruitful in cases of tyranny at sea. The records of every foreign port with which our men that "go down to the sea in ships" have dealings, teem with the damning evidences of this discreditable fact. It was but the other day that we copied into these columns a carefully-elaborated pamphlet, written by an honorable merchant of Liverpool, in which it was set forth beyond denial or even cavil, that the marine hospitals of that city are continually crowded with the victims of outrageous cruelties inflicted by American officers under the shelter of the American flag. The perpetrators of these iniquities shamelessly avail themselves of the national banner as their "altar of refuge," and laugh at law and humanity alike from their polluted decks. What ALSATIA was to the murderers and bullies of London in the "good old days" of sanctuary, that the Republican quarter-deck has now become for murderers and bullies of republican origin, in all foreign waters. On our own side of the ocean we have been over-indifferent to the disgrace of this state of things. Our English cousins who are forced to be the daily spectators of the actual misery and wrong which it brings with it, have at last began to move for its abolition.

We publish to-day a debate in the House of Commons on the 2d of August, in the course of which an address to her Majesty was moved by Mr. MONCKTON MILNES, for the initiation of such diplomatic arrangements with the Government of the United States as might tend to develop some practical remedy for this now intolerable abuse. Mr. MONCKTON MILNES is well known in this country in the character of a liberal, enlightened Englishman, whose sympathies with all that is free and sound in American life and American institutions are of the warmest; and whose good-will to this country has been often proved, and in many ways. A better man could hardly have been found to introduce so delicate and difficult a subject to the attention of British legislators, and the speech of Mr. MILNES breathes precisely that spirit of enlarged and candid and practical humanity in which we should be glad to feel assured that the matter will be treated by our own Government. As much too, may fairly be said for the comments of the London Times upon the debate and its results. There should be no room in the discussion of this question for small international jealousies, or merely commercial rivalry. It is a case which concerns the civilization of our times quite as nearly as the interests of any one nation, or of any one class of men.

When we find the American mercantile marine responsible for throwing nearly one hundred and fifty bruised and mangled human beings upon the charities of a single English port in the course of a single year, without relief or reparation possible to the sufferers, or justice to be administered to the offenders, it is certainly quite time that we should bestir ourselves to deal with a scandal so monstrous. Mr. MILNES, of course, can suggest only methods of punishment. Methods of prevention, if any such be applicable, must be inaugurated at home and in the outset of these voyages, which are expanding our commerce at the cost of our character and our good name. The treaty of extradition which exists between England and this country has been proved imperfect, in its arrangements for bringing offenders of this class to justice. Their crimes being perpetrated out of the reach of any American Court of Law, original proceedings only for their arrest can, of course, be taken within the English jurisdiction; and Mr. MILNES aptly cites the case of a villainous murder perpetrated on board the American ship Etiwan a year ago, in which case the murderer was consigned by Baron BRAMWELL to the custody of our Consul, his crime having been committed two miles and a half beyond the line of British law. The witnesses, in this instance, escaped, and the man on reaching America was suffered to go at large. If the workings of the Treaty of Extradition are thus uncertain and clumsy in their effect upon criminals of a graver character, the relations of our Consuls in England with the English law on the one hand, and with their own countrymen on the other, are such as to secure virtual and regular immunity to scoundrels who merely that did their duty, without actually putting them to death. Here, it is that Mr. MILNES seeks for an immediate remedy, and it will be far from creditable to the intelligence and statesmanship of the two greatest maritime powers in the world, should he seek for a remedy in vain. It is true that the convention, by virtue of which our Consuls in the French Dominions are invested with summary jurisdiction over American seamen in such cases, has not proved altogether satisfactory in practice, although clearly desirable from the theory of consulships as originally understood in maritime law. But some modification of this convention might be safely negotiated with Great Britain. The essential community of laws which exists between that country and our own; the general and undeniable equity of the English courts in the administration of justice, and the many ties, as well of sympathy as of interest, which unite us with England, all plead in favor of some cordial, fair and fairly guarded system which shall enable our mercantile representatives in Great Britain to combine their action with that of the local authorities for the purpose of securing the rights of seamen on board of American ships, and the character of the American merchant-navy. The objection taken by the British Attorney-General to the exercise of a summary jurisdiction within the limits of Great Britain by any foreign representative is perfectly sound; and no such claim should for a moment be made by our Government. But it ought not to require any wonderful degree of ingenuity to devise some system of associated supervision in such cases, which should meet the ends of justice without invading the sanctities of national independence.

All this, however, is in the way of punishment of offences committed. The method of prevention can be considered, fortunately, without the trouble of a reference to foreign Powers. Our merchant navy needs remodeling at home. The sudden expansion which it received upon the opening of a really new world to commerce ten years ago, has brought evil with good in its train. It has given us more ships and more seamen, but it has given us also seamen of a more heterogeneous class and captains of a more irresponsible character. The remedy for these things lies largely in the hands of the owners of vessels and of the mercantile community. If our Chambers of Commerce and Boards of Trade and Underwriters would set at once about establishing a system of marine examinations for the probation of our merchant officers, we should attack the evil which Mr. MILNES has so honestly and so stoutly denounced, at its very fountain-heads. Considerations of the highest and of the lowest character unite in urging this duty upon these responsible classes, and we trust they will not be slow in the work that cries so loudly for their action.

Napoleon and the Duchies.

There was no portion of "the Italian question," as it stands at present, until the last mail arrived, involved in so much perplexity and uncertainty as the fate of the Duchies of Tuscany and Modena. Austria has declared that the preliminaries of the peace arranged at Villafranca contain a guarantee for the return of the two fugitive Grand Dukes. LOUIS NAPOLEON denies, however, that he entered into any engagement to assist them in getting back on their thrones, or to allow others to assist them, and it is now pretty well ascertained that these two potentates will be one of the first sacrifices offered on the altar of Italian independence. That the Grand Duke of Tuscany anticipates his fate is evident from the fact that he has already abdicated in favor of his son, and that he of Modena has grave doubts as to the manner in which he will close his career is evidenced by his going through the farce of dressing up Austrian soldiers in the uniform of the House of Este, to make believe he is coming back at the head of his own army. As to his success there is no doubt whatever. No struggle between the Italian people and their Princes, as long as there is no foreign interference, can cost fifty rounds of ammunition.

The affair is remarkable, however, mainly for the eagerness with which the Mazzinists have laid hold of the notion that LOUIS NAPOLEON was really about to restore the exiled Dukes by force, or allow Austria to afford them active assistance. It was felt, and correctly enough, that it would hardly be possible for him to commit an act more damaging to his reputation in all that concerns Italy and its affairs; and the "Reds" were looking forward with intense anxiety to the spectacle of LEOPOLD, fresh from the Austrian camp, entering Florence under the protection of French bayonets, and amid the hearty curses of his people. But it does not require any great stock of sagacity, or more than a very cursory acquaintance with the history of the French revolution, to conclude that the French Emperor, though he had as little sympathy with Italian liberty as his worst enemies have ever ascribed to him, was not to be caught in so dangerous a trap as this would prove. If there be one thing more than another which has, ever since 1815, amidst all the hatreds and jealousies by which she has been dogged at every step, secured to France entire liberty in the management of her domestic affairs, and entire immunity from foreign meddling, it is the fact that every Frenchman who bore arms and every French family whose members bore arms against France during the war of the revolution, was blasted by popular hatred. It was the one sin for which no atonement could suffice; the one stain which no tears of repentance could wash out. The day on which the Bourbons fled to the Austrian and Prussian camps, and marched in arms under a foreign flag towards the French frontier, was the day on which the throne passed away from their house. Their honor might have outlived the tenth of August, and even the twenty-first of January, but they could not outlive the aid of foreign bayonets. When the French people made that crime inexplicable, even when committed to regain a throne, they did more to consolidate the national independence than by gaining any of the great victories by which it was afterwards furnished. They made France the last resort in all cases of political controversy, and made every monarch who has since occupied the French throne accept the most ignominious exile with thankfulness sooner than ask foreign aid in returning home. The Count DE PROVENCE would not have long remained LOUIS XVIII., if the armies who restored him had not remained to protect him; and CHARLES X. owed his downfall in 1830, fully as much to the fact that he had once borne arms against his people as to the promulgation of the royal ordinances. LOUIS PHILIPPE stepped into his vacant place far more in virtue of his having fought at Valmy and Jemappes in defence of French soil, than of his possible fitness as a Constitutional Ruler. The race has not yet forgotten the terrible lesson of the Revolution. The Count DE CHAMBORD, strong as is his faith in his right, ever thinks of appealing to the sympathies of foreign highlanders. He takes good care not to ask for Austrian intervention. At the very first rumor of war between Austria and France, he quitted Vienna, lest even the odor of foreign sympathies should cling to his skirts. The Bonaparties have paid even greater respect to French instincts than if there had been French blood in their veins for sixty generations. The first Emperor came back from Elba with nothing but the old gray coat, and the well-remembered cocked hat; the second endured for thirty years an exile which he had done nothing to deserve, and to which foreigners had sentenced him, without ever even invoking foreign sympathies or seeking to carry back a foreigner in his train. If the Italians are to take a respectable place in Europe as a united nation, the proscription, utter and irreversible, of all Italians, who have borne arms against Italy under a foreign flag, is one of their first duties. In a country which has suffered so much from foreign domination as Italy, the popular notions of political right and wrong are always more or less confused. The first step in the establishment of sound morality is the sharp and clear definition of treason against the nation, and its vigorous application to the king as well as the beggar. Nothing will offer so much protection against future treachery, and nothing do more to promote a sound and hearty feeling of nationality, and a strong sentiment of national dignity. No man knows the value of these two agents better than LOUIS NAPOLEON, for no man living has used them to such tremendous purpose. We may rely on it, he will no more seek to outrage them in Tuscany, by forcing a traitorous monarch on an indignant people, than to surround himself with Swiss guards in Paris.

The President in Mexico.

The full and graphic correspondence from Mexico, which we published on Saturday last, is completed to-day, by a picture of such social disorders and excesses as seem to belong rather to the age of Gil Blas than to our own. The great Republic of the South is coming to pieces more rapidly than ever, and we who should be busy now in putting new life into its scattered fragments, are lending our aid to the work of annihilation.

Mr. BUCHANAN is doing his best to stultify our Envoy, Mr. MCLANE, upon whose labors in his mission we have so frequently had occasion to comment with satisfaction. The history of our relations with the successive powers that rose and fell in Mexico before Mr. MCLANE found the Liberals entrenched at Vera Cruz, and wisely accepted them as the real capital of the country, it is not necessary for us here to recapitulate. That history may be summed up in one word. We deliberately abdicated our position in Mexico. We left the foreign influence at the capital entirely in the hands of Monsieur DE GABRIAC, the French Minister, whose proclivities were opposed to everything that was republican or anti-clerical, and of his minion, Mr. OTWAY, the British Envoy.

How these men did their work our readers know, as also the gallant efforts which Mr. MCLANE has made to strengthen the hands of JUAREZ and his Government against them. They know, too, the promising terms of the Treaty at last negotiated between our Envoy and the Juarez Government; and they are now informed of the fate of that Treaty at the hands of our own Chief Magistrate.

The President's proposal to JUAREZ is that he should sell a portion of Mexican soil to the United States, in order to obtain money with which to fight the Mexicans who are opposed to him. Seeing, however, that the adoption of this miserable device would immediately debase the JUAREZ party in the eyes of its fellow-citizens, of all classes and degrees, the Liberal leader declines to accept the suggestion or the bribe, and the United States are thus left, not only without any moral influence with either party in Mexico, but with the onus, besides, of having insulted the country and people with an offer which, had it been made to any established State, would have been rejected with scorn and defiance.

If it be not too late to repair the mischief thus done, the only way of regaining our natural influence—though it is idle to hope that Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. CASS can be brought to see it—will be to abandon at once this silly and nefarious notion of buying Lower California, and simply to dictate upon the basis of American ideas a settlement of the pending difficulties in Mexico—which settlement should be insisted on, if necessary, with the alternative of arms. There is the more reason to do this immediately, because there are already rumors abroad that France and England, moved at length by the horrors of the Mexican position which should have moved our Government long ago, have determined to do what we should have done and what we ought to do at once—namely, to dictate peace to the Mexicans. This is a measure demanded alike by the exigency of the case in the neighboring Republic, and by the appeal of civilization. Of course, should France and England, or either of those Powers alone, undertake to settle the difficulties which keep Mexico immersed in a sea of blood and trouble, there will be throughout this country a great cry of violence done the Monroe doctrine. But it cannot be too soon understood that the position of Mexico loudly demands interference, and that if the United States, whose duty it is to interfere, will not do so, any European Power faithfully performing this duty will receive the applause and thanks of the civilized world, in spite of the denunciations which may come from this side of the water. If the Government of Washington will take the step, no European Power will attempt to oppose it, but, on the contrary, as the London Times has already very fairly and very plainly stated, the action of the United States will meet with the cordial approbation and the fullest moral support at least of Great Britain. But if, on the other hand, our Government persists in being too heedless or too stupid to perform its natural functions in this matter, and continues to look on while Mexico reels from deep to deep of anarchy, we must be prepared to submit to European interference in Mexican affairs; to see the rights which we have neglected or abused, appropriated by others; and thus to risk the long complications and eventually warlike solution which must inevitably follow upon such a state of things.

THE SECTIONAL PARTY.—Sometime since we took occasion to advert to the fact that on all questions of a strictly Slavery character the North would necessarily unite, and that, being stronger than the South, it must prevail. That suggestion, uttered in no taunting or unfriendly spirit, has been taken in good part by the Lynchburg Virginian, which says: "It is not only a great truth, but it is a significant warning which the South should heed;" and adds:

"But it is time now that we should appreciate the fact so significantly stated by the TIMES. Of course, we would counsel no submission to wrong. But we would insist upon it that the people—in whom alone reposes the power of correction—should discountenance and put down every useless and unnecessary agitation of sectional topics. Even were the South in the majority, what good would it accomplish by it? What good would it do the minority—as it is for the Union States, and growing comparatively weaker every day—from her [illegible] support for any measure which would, that way or the other, [illegible] in the controversy, except where our rights and our feelings are directly attacked? It seems to us, clearly, that this is our true policy."

These remarks are sensible and conciliatory, as is also the application which the Lynchburg paper goes on to make, of the rule thus laid down, to the question of re-opening the Slave Trade—a measure which it admits that the superior strength in Congress of the free States must render forever impracticable, and which, for that reason alone, even if there were no other or better, it must be useless, and worse than useless, for the South to agitate.

We would not, any more than our Virginian cotemporary, counsel the South "to submit to wrong," and we gladly indorse the good sense of its closing remark, that "he is no true friend of the South who needlessly provokes sectional disputes and wrangles;" taking the liberty also to add that the same sentiment will apply to our own northern latitude, without material variation.

The Result in Texas.

Gen. HOUSTON has gained largely upon the regular Democratic ticket, and although the returns which have reached us do not warrant the conclusion that he is elected Governor of Texas over RUNNELLS, still such an event is rendered quite probable. At all events, the venerable Ex-President of Texas has made an excellent run, and whether successful or not, has manifested a popularity for which few, either at the North or the South, gave him credit.

It is noticeable that Gen. Houston's large vote and probable election, afford a degree of satisfaction to the Republicans, which cannot be accounted for on personal grounds, for there is no special reason why he should be a favorite with them, nor has he in fact ever stood high in their regard. From the first election of JACKSON down he has sustained every Democratic President—his only aberration being into the American or Know-Nothing ranks a few years ago, and the organization of that Party being extinct in Texas, the veteran politician is again avowedly a Democrat, and, as such, a supporter of BUCHANAN. Why, then, should there be Republican joy over any success of his? There is a reason—a good and sound one—and if we mistake not it is this: Gen. HOUSTON is a moderate man in his political opinions. With a courage which few public men can command, and which almost none venture to exercise without self-sacrifice, he rejects the ultraisms of his own section of the Union. In his senatorial career he has consistently pursued a conciliatory and national course. No project of disunion or act likely to inflame the feelings of the North, has received any countenance from him. On the contrary, he set his face persistently against all Southern measures of an extreme character. That he opposed and voted against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise will be freshly remembered, and that he would have voted against the Lecompton Constitution, had he felt at liberty to follow his personal convictions, in derogation of the instructions of his State, is no less to be borne in mind. In the recent election, also, he had the pluck to take the field as an independent candidate against the regular nominee, on the avowed ground of hostility to the Slave-trade. In short, he has proved himself a man for the country, rather than one exclusively for his own section of it, and for that reason he not only receives, but deserves, the approbation accorded him by the Northern Opposition. But is it not pertinent to ask whether there may not be an ultra Northern, as well as Southern, sentiment; and if so what would those who applaud Gen. HOUSTON for his middle course say to a similar policy on the part of a leader of the Opposition? Who are the public men most energetically praised among us—those who, like HOUSTON, refrain from the ultraisms of their own part of the country, or those who push Northern ultraisms to their extremest length? Is it not worth while to put this inquiry to ourselves, in all soberness and candor? Is it possible—we make the suggestion with great diffidence and caution—but is it barely possible that we are admiring what we decline to practice.

VISIT OF THE RICHMOND GRAYS.

Their Enthusiastic Reception by the National Guard and the Citizens of New-York.

ATTENDANCE AT ST. JOHN'S CHURCH.

On the occasion of the removal of the remains of Ex-President JAMES MONROE from this City to the chief town of his native State, Richmond, Va., thirteen months ago, when the National Guard, a division of our Seventh, acted as the escort, and were so hospitably treated by the citizens, and especially by the citizen soldiery of the capital of the Old Dominion, there has existed a desire, an anxiety in short, that the Richmond Grays, to whom, in particular, they were indebted for extra good-fellowship, should take a trip to New-York and get that good-fellowship reciprocated. If all the citizen soldiery, if all the citizens of Richmond could have come along with them, closing stores and warehouses, and for a while bidding adieu to dimes and dollars, it would have been so much the better,—but as that could not be, the Grays, as representatives of the soldiery, and the Mayor and Common Council, as representing the citizens, of Richmond, were most welcome. The announcement of their coming caused quite a sensation for some weeks past. Our Mayor, our Common Council, our citizens, and our citizen soldiery have been on the qui vive. The Old Dominion and the Empire City, the F. F. V.'s and the Knickerbockers, were to sit at a common table, to eat from congenial plates, to drink from fraternal glasses, and generally to go through the processes of degustition and imbibition in loving company. There was an enthusiastic welcome due to our Virginia guests, and it was enthusiastically given on Saturday evening.

The Richmond Grays were organized as a company in the month of January, 1844, under the captaincy of Mr. CHARLES DENNIS. The color of their uniform, from which their name was derived, was chosen as a compliment to our National Guard. In the month of June following Mr. H. L. BOZEE became their Captain, and on the succeeding anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, they made their first public parade with thirty-six men. In the next year Lieut. R. G. SCOTT, at present United States Consul at Rio Janeiro, succeeded Capt. DENNIS in command, and under him a portion of the force served in Gen. TAYLOR'S line in the Mexican war. Their present Captain, Mr. WYATT M. ELLIOTT, a graduate of the Virginia Military Institute, was appointed in January, 1847. The corps now numbers 97 men, and is deservedly in very flourishing circumstances. The following is a list of the officers: Capt. Wyatt M. Elliott, Lieut. Louis J. Bossieux, Second-Lieut. Jacob B. Crawford, Ensign O. G. Crosby, Quartermaster R. A. Cockin, Sergeants John T. Rogers, Wm. Ira Smith, Aug. M. Barrett, John B. Vaughan, John Doyle, Corporals J. S. Michard, Cyrus Bossieux, W. H. Johnson, J. C. Redfish, James Pegram.

On Friday the Grays left Richmond en route for this City. The Richmond Grays were the South in the contest, when in the separate for all what good result would be obtained by it? But as the South is in the minority—as it is for the Union Southern, and growing comparatively weaker every day—from not a sound support for any such policy would that way or the co-operation, should [illegible] from participation in the controversy, except where our rights and our feelings are directly attacked? It seems to us, clearly, that this is our true policy."

[illegible] Philadelphia [illegible] Wash's Guard, a general meeting in? Cheering and great each other warmly, but it is only [illegible] know how to clasp hands. Boo-hoo-hoo, oh, [illegible] the Richmond Grays. Cheer upon cheer, [illegible] esprit of Mars—gay, an Adonis jungle fellows—from the National Guard. And so New-York and Richmond, in military costume, and with warm, [illegible] hearts, met and mingled.

Then Captain ELLIOTT, of the Grays; Col. BURWAY and Col. LAYMAN, of the Guard, formally [illegible] and greeted each other. Aldermen [illegible] TOOMEY, PECK, OWENS, and LOZIER, and Commissioner LAUMAN, BRENNAN, FOSTER, VAN TINE, and [illegible] several officers of the Seventh Regiment, who were present in citizen's dress, were also introduced. Captain ELLIOTT, in a few words, stated his regret that the Mayor of Richmond and some members of the Common Council of that city had not [illegible] to accompany them, but he was happy to say that the Mayor, at least, would reach New-York on Monday.

On their way to the Ferry the cheering was renewed by the National Guard, and by the dense crowd which lined both sides of the street. A boat had been provided specially for the occasion by the Jersey City Ferry Company, which was almost disappointed at crowded on its transit to the New-York side. As it neared the shore, thousands of voices began to shout in their turn, the piers were [illegible] people, who, not content with rendering themselves hoarse for a day or two by their [illegible] run, sent up rockets, ignited Roman candles, and otherwise expended their enthusiasm in pyrotechnical exhibitions. Along Cortlandt-street, up Broadway, to the Brandreth House, corner of Canal-street, the plaudits and pyrotechny continued. The Brandreth House being appointed as the quarters of the Grays during their visit, they were marched and recommended thereto, and each man afterwards did what was right in his own eyes. The majority thought a glimpse at the City by gas-light could not be an unfitting close to the fatigues of the day, and in company with numerous friends, eager to do the honors, they spread themselves, in more senses than one, up and down Broadway.

Yesterday, the Fourth and Eighth Companies of the Seventh Regiment, escorted them from the Brandreth House to St. John's Church, where a sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. WARNER, one of the ministers of that Church, and Chaplain of the Seventh Regiment. The building was crowded, and numbers were unable to obtain admittance. The companies, the Grays included, were unaccompanied by bands, and were without arms.

To-day our Richmond visitors will visit the public institutions, escorted by the authorities, and members of the First and Sixth Companies of the Regiment, Captains NAVARO and BRAGG.

CITY INTELLIGENCE.

THE WHALE AT BAY SIDE.—The fin-back whale which ran ashore on Wednesday morning last near Willets's Point, continues to attract large numbers of visitors. The monster probably strayed into the Sound in quest of food, and getting into shoal water and between two rocks, was unable to extricate itself. Capt. THOMAS and Mr. MOON obtained it—one the monster's head and the other the tail. Mr. THOMAS, who is "easy" for a merchant man, secured the captain's hook, but soon found himself towed overboard, i. e., not on his boat in the sound. Mr. MOON got a harpoon from his tail, whereupon both retired from the vicinity and went to look after reinforcements. The whale was seen left high and dry, and was subject to successes. He was drawn upon the beach, and by the time the end of his was in good preservation for taxidermy. The cetacean is the common fin-back species, and measures about thirty feet in length. After the whale is will be dissected, and its skeleton preserved for a place among the curiosities of the Bay.

A CARGO OF OFFAL AT STATEN-ISLAND.—The sloop Gaston, from this City, loaded with offal, discharged her cargo in the bay, last night, and the larger part of it was washed ashore on the Staten Island side. ACCIDENTALLY DROWNED.—A lad about 11 years of age, was accidentally drowned on Saturday afternoon, while playing on the dock foot of Broome-street. Deceased was climbing up on one of the piles of the pier, when he fell into the water and was drowned before assistance could be rendered. Coroner O'KEEFE held an inquest on the body yesterday.

KILLED TO DEATH.—A boy 16 years of age, named THOMAS BERRIGAN, struck a horse, which he had just taken from a cart, with a whip. The animal kicked him violently in the breast, causing almost instantaneous death. The occurrence took place near the stable No. 309 Sixth-street. An inquest was held by Coroner O'KEEFE, and a verdict in accordance with the facts was rendered.

Fires.

FIRE IN CORTLANDT-STREET.—The Eighth District alarm at about 10½ o'clock A. M., yesterday, was caused by a fire in the hotel No. 98 Cortlandt-street, kept by Mr. G. C. BRIGGS. The fire originated from the clothes of a girl named CARMINETTA CARL, who was filling lamps with fluid. The girl's face was badly blistered. The firemen promptly put out the fire. The damage to furniture, principally by water, amounts to $300, and is covered by an insurance of $2,000 in the Hartford, Peter Cooper, North River and Connecticut Insurance Companies. The building, owned by F. FRANZALI, was damaged about $200. Insured, C. D. The damage to stock, furniture, &c., amounts to about $1,000, and is fully covered by insurance in the Rutgers, Williamsburgh City, Harmony and Relief Insurance Companies. The fire originated in a closet used for the storage of provisions.

FIRE IN NEW BOWERY.—A trifling fire occurred at 7½ o'clock A. M. yesterday in Central Hall in New Bowery. The fire was caused by some boys playing with lighted shavings.

Police Reports.

CONFLICT BETWEEN A POLICEMAN AND A HACKMAN.—On Saturday morning, Officer McDOUGALL, of the Harbor Police squad, arrested a hackman named JAS. WYATT, for persisting in going on board the steamboat Commonwealth in opposition to the instructions of the Police. WYATT told the officer that he had a check for some passenger's baggage, and had a right to get it from the boat. The officer replied that his orders were to prevent all hackmen from going on board, and attempted to put WYATT off the gang-plank. A fight ensued, and WYATT was arrested, taken before Alderman BRADY, and complained against by the officer for assault and battery. The captain of the boat was in Court, and stated that at times he had given permission to the hackmen to go on the boat for baggage, but he generally restricted them. In consideration of this fact Alderman BRADY dismissed WYATT with a reprimand for resisting the officer, deeming that the latter had punished the officer sufficiently to make any from the Court necessary. WYATT, who has been a hackman over twenty years, evidently acted as he did because he thought the officer exceeded his instructions, while the latter simply enforced them to the letter.

SUPPOSED OF BURGLARY.—The dwelling-house of Mr. BABBITT, corner of Eighth-avenue and Eighteenth-street, was entered by burglars on Wednesday last, and $200 in coin and bank bills was stolen from a trunk. The next day Stephen Boyle and Wm. Goodall, whose thievishness are in the collection at the Police Head-quarters, and who have frequently been in the hands of the Police, incautiously displayed a considerable sum of money. Officers RUSCH and FOSTER, learning of their unusual wealth, took them into custody on suspicion of being the robbers. Justice GEDNEY held both the accused for examination. Boyle has recently returned from Blackwell's Island, where he had just served a term of six months.

RESISTING THE POLICE.—Officer COUGLIN, of the First Ward, arrested on Saturday, a man named William Cullen, on a charge of disorderly conduct. As the prisoner was being conveyed to the Station-house, he made a sudden attack upon the officer, knocked him down, and escaped. Cullen was soon afterwards re-arrested on the Battery by officers Todd and Nolan, of the Harbor Police, but before he was secured he made a stout resistance. He was taken before Justice CONNOLLY and committed for examination. The accused is said by the police to have been released recently from prison, whither he had been sent for causing the death of a boy about a year since in Mulberry-alley, Brooklyn.

SUSPECT OF JEWELRY.—A man named Francis Duffy was arrested yesterday by Officer Huff, of the Seventh Precinct, on a charge of having stolen a gold watch, two gold finger-rings and a gold seal, valued at $100, from Wm. Dunlay, foreman of Fire Engine Company No. 6. The property, which was all recovered, was stolen from the engine house. Duffy was held by Justice BOSWORTH in $600 bail to answer the charge.

RECOVERY OF STOLEN GOODS.—Three men, named James Collins, John Pool and Michael Roach, were arrested on Saturday by the Sixth Precinct Police, with twelve gross of plated spoons in their possession, which are supposed to have been stolen. The box that contained the spoons was marked "M. W. Seymour." The prisoners were all locked up on suspicion of burglary.

CHARGED WITH GRAND LARCENY.—Silas James was taken before Alderman BEEBE at the Lower Police Court, on Saturday, on a charge of stealing an eye-glass, valued at $41, from the house of Joseph Newman, No. 45 Gold-street. The accused was committed for examination.

ARRESTED AS LARCENY.—A young man named William Beasley was caught on Saturday in the act of carrying a trunk from the house of Mrs. Clarinda Parker, No. 45 East Twenty-sixth-street. Bagley was arrested, taken before Justice QUAKENBOSS, and committed for trial.

OUTRAGEOUS ASSAULT.—Last evening a man named James C. Weaver was arrested by the Fifth Ward police, for attempting to commit an outrage upon the person of a little girl four years of age, in Leonard-street. The accused was held for examination.

BROOKLYN INTELLIGENCE.

BURGLARS ARRESTED.—WM. DALROW and JAS. BROWN, endorsed by the Police as professional thieves, were arrested Saturday night by Capt. BEARDSLEY, of the Third Precinct, while in the act of robbing house No. 226 Union-street. Another person was arrested yesterday on suspicion of having robbed the house of the Rev. GARDNER TAYLOR, No. 98 Sumpter-street. In both of these cases the families occupying the houses were out of town. If people would notify the Police when they are to leave their houses unoccupied, they would keep a special watch on such places.

SUICIDE.—Late Friday night last, a man deliberately jumped into the middle of the East River from the Fulton ferry boat Greenpoint, and was drowned, because no effort was made by the officers of the boat to save him. The alarm was given by the time the man struck the water, but not the slightest notice was taken of the matter by the pilot. The man was apparently dressed in dark roundabout or frock coat, dark cap, and he was short and rather stoutly built.

MORTALITY.—There were 142 deaths in this City last week, classified as follows: Men, 19; women, 21; boys, 53; girls, 46; adults, 40; children, 102. In the month of July, 1858, there were 655 deaths, and in 1857, same month, 608, being a decrease of 46. For the week ending Aug. 12, 1858, there were 169 deaths, and for the week ending Aug. 13, 1859, there were 142 deaths, being a decrease of 27.

ATTEMPTED OUTRAGE.—A woman who was searching for her husband in Pacific-street, at about 8½ o'clock Saturday night, was seized by a gang of ruffians and taken by them to the pier at the foot of the street, where they attempted to outrage her person. Her cries for assistance attracted the attention of Officer MERRITT, of the First Precinct, who rescued the girl in season to rescue the woman, but not to arrest her assailants.

COUNTERFEITERS ARRESTED.—GOTLIEB REEN porter-house keeper, and GREEN SCHWARZ, brewer, were arrested yesterday by Officers RAYNOR and BERRY, of the Sixth Precinct, on a charge of counterfeiting money. They were held for a hearing. HENRY ROTH, tailor, was arrested in the same District for passing counterfeit money. He was committed for examination.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN BROOKLYN.—Every dealer in ardent spirits, having any pretensions of respectability, closed up his place of business yesterday and sold none whatever. A few of the more hardened class kept open in defiance of law, and several of their number were locked up in the cells of the Station houses, where they will have to remain until liberated on bail this morning.

FIRE.—Store No. 67 Furman-street, owned by R. D. HAYWARD, and occupied as a mustard factory by Mr. DEAN, was discovered on fire at 1½ o'clock yesterday morning by the crew of boat No. 2 of the Harbor Police. The alarm was given, and the firemen turned out promptly. The loss by fire and water is estimated at from $5,000 to $10,000.

THE PORCINE WAR.—Under direction of the Deputy Superintendent of Police, the police of the Ninth Precinct on Saturday made a descent upon the hogs and their owners, residing in the vicinity. They captured 175 hogs, 48 goats and 54 men. The Court will have a busy time of it to-day.

STREET ROBBERY.—On Friday afternoon last, Mrs. THOMAS H. KELSEY, of East Warren-street, was knocked down on South-street, near State, by two boys, who robbed her of a porte-monnaie, containing $17. One of the young scamps was subsequently arrested by Officer DONNELLY, of the Third Precint. He gave his name as SAMUEL CORDOVA.

ACCIDENT.—The driver of a car between Bedford and East New-York, on Saturday morning fell under the wheels of his car, and was run over and seriously injured. He was taken to the City Hospital by the Ninth Precinct Police. The name of the injured man is CONKLIN.

RE-DEDICATED.—The old R. C. Church of the Assumption, corner of York and Jay streets, having undergone extensive repairs recently, was re-dedicated yesterday.

The Toronto Nunnery Case.

LETTER FROM MISS STARR—SHE GIVES HER VIEWS OF LIFE IN A NUNNERY.

The Montreal papers publish the following letter from Miss ELIZABETH STARR, the young lady who was reported to have been enticed into a Toronto nunnery, to the grief of her father and the chagrin of the Detroit Press. It will be observed that the young lady declares she entered the convent of her own free will, but came out displeased with life in a nunnery. The letter is addressed from Saratoga to her father, and is published by request of the latter. It is a curious document:

SARATOGA, Aug. 3, 1859.

MY DEAR PAPA: The excitement and agitation caused by the wrong step I have taken in leaving my house without my parents' consent, and letting them suffer such agony on my account, makes me miserable, and preys so deeply on my heart that I often think it will soon terminate my life. I feel it almost impossible to give you a clear statement of facts, and am deeply sorry for having destroyed those letters written me by different priests, whose correspondence commenced while I was in Toronto, May, 1858. You remember we arrived from England in November, and went to Toronto in December. I did not attend the Catholic Church until the month of May, and then I wrote to a priest by the name of O'REILY; our servant, MARIA, gave me his name, and carried him my letters; he sent me a verbal message saying he would be happy to see me in the vestry-room of the church; where I explained to him my wishes to become a Catholic, and a Catholic nun; he then desired me to call upon him at the Bishop's Palace, which I did, and as I was coming away, I met the Bishop, and of my own accord turned back to speak to him, and opened my mind fully to him. He replied he would think about it; some time after this I went to the Bishop's Palace to see Mr. O'REILY, when he was not there, and I saw in his absence Mr. J. BRUYERE, who did not approve of my plan, and said I had better leave it to Bishop CHARBONNEL to decide. Soon after I saw the Bishop, who did not give me a positive answer, but remained outwardly passive, I knowing, from my own observations, he encouraged it. About a month after this I was introduced by Mr. BRUYERE to Mme. POISSON, at the Palace. She was delighted to make my acquaintance, and also charmed with the plan of my becoming a Carmelite nun, she and Mr. PHILEBIS, who had recently arrived from Paris together, and he having lived four months amongst the Order of Carmelites. They two offered to take me to Paris, the Bishop CHARBONNEL having proposed the plan of Paris or England. My being placed at Toledo was only a temporary arrangement of Mr. GRANEE's. He also suggested my not letting my parents know where I was until I had crossed the Atlantic Ocean. Bishop CHARBONNEL's first plan was to send me to Baltimore, and there to prepare for the order of Carmelites in England, but finding some disputes had arisen in Baltimore among the nuns in the convent there, he changed his decision, and Mr. GRANEE took it into his own hands to send me to Toledo, before he had received any orders from the Bishop—at least, this is his story. My own statement to the Bishop about my family was, that they had ever been most indulgent and kind, and had treated me with entire and devoted affection, and would allow me to do anything but become a Catholic. I stated my object in becoming a Catholic was also to become a Nun, and I was perfectly certain they never would consent to this. Then he said it was my duty to leave them. Mr. GRANEE then went to the Grey Nunnery in Montreal and told Sister SICOURNE, mistress of the Novices, his plan as to my journey. The day after his visit I called at the Convent, saw Sister SICOURNE for the first time, and planned with her my dress, which she got ready for me and gave me the next day; I took it home and put it on. On the Saturday morning I left Madame CORREIN at 6 in the morning, whence I proceeded to the Seminary, whence Mr. GRANEE was in waiting with a railway ticket in hand, and gave me some money. The money he gave me was to pay my expenses from Toronto to Toledo. The principal priest who corresponded with me in Toronto was Mr. PHILEBIS. He wrote me some eight letters, and had them left at the Convent named the House of Providence, and where I saw him several times, when he conversed with me on the plan to be adopted. On leaving Toronto the last time, he said I had better destroy his letters, but gave me no reason for so doing. They were about my becoming a nun and leaving my parents, which he perfectly approved of. There was no female companion provided for to take charge of me from Montreal to Toledo. I acted entirely under the advice of Mr. GRANEE. The newspaper states that my arrival at Toledo was a matter of surprise. The Superior of the Toledo Convent was introduced to me at the Grey Nunnery in Montreal, and actually clandestinely produced my carpet-bag from a room in the convent, where it had been locked up through mistake, and then they make it appear in the paper, I was unknown to them. My first letter, after leaving home, was written from Sandwich to my mother, sent to Mr. PHILEBIS at Toronto, and he inclosed it to Mr. GRANEE, who posted it in Montreal. The second letter was written about a week after I arrived at Toledo, and sent to Mr. GRANEE direct, inclosing one for a friend in England. I believe I wrote two other letters, which were sent in the same way. I received two letters from Montreal while at Toledo, one from Mr. BOURMEAUNE, informing me of the movements of my parents, but not expressing one word of anxiety; and the other letter, from Mr. GRANEE, on the same subject, telling me also not to write to my parents until I was safely landed on the other side of the water. I had never known Mr. BOURMEAUNE before the morning of my departure for Toronto, when he came and spoke to me whilst I was waiting to get a railway ticket from Mr. GRANEE; he gave me a little book, and told me he felt the highest interest in all that concerned me. I was to be sent to Paris in a few weeks with the proposal and entire consent of Bishop CHARBONNEL, I believe. I wrote three letters to Mr. GRANEE from Toledo, merely on religious subjects, inquiring about my parents, and saying that I felt myself a burden at the convent. I did not experience the sympathy I had hoped to find in those who were connected by Jesus Christ. I was left sometimes a day without being seen to, and the cold heartedness of these sisters made my life miserable, and I did not find them actuated by loving dispositions and I seen was taught that it was not necessary to be in a convent to become religious, and that God had created me to be in the world to resist world's temptations, a good Christian girl, to be faithful to Him, and affectionate to my parents. I am sorry you paid $15 to Madame POISSON, to whom I did not owe one cent. I never wrote to her for any money and when she offered me some in Toronto I refused it. Mr. PHILEBIS' coat was the letter already mentioned when I was in Toledo, without my asking for it, saying he thought I might be in want of Summer apparel. The day you came for me I had already given Nic the superiorre to take charge of her me, and she has it still in her possession. She bought some articles of dress for me, which came to 50. I must now add in conclusion that the Superiorre in Toledo gave me full liberty to go home to my parents, but it did not seem much like it in reality, when you came for me my telling the Superiorre I had heard your voice and was going in the drawing-room to see you, and she telling me to go back to my room, and even pushing me with her hands. Certainly here both words and actions spoke for themselves, but I wish you also to understand, that except the mere form of taking the Superiorre permission, I had full liberty to go out whenever I liked; but I did not abuse that liberty, as the Superiorre told me at the end of each week, when I asked her if I had done anything against the rules of the house, she always replied she was much pleased and satisfied with all my conduct. I am ready to take an oath on the Holy Bible for all I have written, and as I am much exhausted by writing such a long letter, I must say good night, hoping the rest of my life may atone for my past conduct, is the wish of your penitent child, ELIZABETH STARR.

I fear I did not explain to you quite fully, that I did most earnestly request the Bishop and priests to keep my secret most secretly, for fear of your preventing me from becoming a Catholic and a nun, but now that I am convinced of my error, I think it was extremely wrong in the Bishop, or his priests, to be influenced by my wishes. It was their duty to face the opposition and to inform you of my whereabouts, no matter what the consequences might be. I wish also to say that I have not the least idea of renouncing the faith I have lately joined, and although having acted indiscreetly in the means I took to become a Catholic, I nevertheless believe firmly in the doctrines, and desire to be a Christian in practice.

A letter from Mr. STARR, the young lady's father, says:

"I never knew, until recent events brought it to light, that she had before taken any steps towards being a Roman Catholic, or had decided fully to become one. She attended Protestant Churches with her parents, and there with them partook of the holy communion, and never showed any repugnance to thus joining us in our devotions. There could, therefore, have been none of the 'persecution,' and 'tyranny' with which we have recently been charged towards our child. All was sweet and harmonious affection between us, and her wishes were in no way 'opposed,' because they were not expressed."

CONFLAGRATIONS.

Disastrous Fire in Cincinnati—Loss $200,000.

From the Cincinnati Gazette, Aug. 12.

A terrific fire broke out about one o'clock yesterday morning, in the rectifying establishment of BOYLE & Co., on East Second-street. How the fire originated is not known. Some of the hands went through the building at nine o'clock, and at that time everything was all right. The only fire in the building on Wednesday was in the portable furnaces o some coppersmiths. There were constant explosions of whisky in the burning building, and the heat was intense, threatening all the neighboring buildings. The fire companies made strenuous efforts to save them, and were partially successful. The flames were got under, as was supposed, when they communicated to the rear of Messrs. PIKE & Co.'s warehouse, on Yeatman-street. The tower bell was rung desperately for the Mohawk and Brighton, and hand companies.

Pike's Building was saved, but not without loss. The large warehouse of Messrs. BOYLE & Co., on the west side of the alley, subsequently caught fire, and later the stores of Messrs. CRANE, BREED & Co., and G. HENSHAW, on Sycamore-street.

It is impossible to describe the singular spectacle as the whisky spilled from the broken barrels, ran into the gutters, and so down into the river, while the cinders fell from above in dazzling showers of golden rain, which no pyrotechnist ever rivaled. The supply of water in the cisterns failed, and the engines were obliged to dam up the gutters and suck up the water which had been once thrown upon the fire. Eventually engines were stationed further off and water obtained. It was said to have been forced, in one case, nearly a half mile.

Four firemen, who were on the ladders placed on adjoining buildings, were struck by the bricks and very badly cut and bruised, though not fatally. They were all doing well yesterday. Their names are JACOB PHILLIPS, JOHN VETTER, WM. ECHERLE and MICHAEL CREEK.

The entire loss is estimated at about $200,000, which is some $8,000 more than the total amount lost during the last official year of the Fire Department.

BOYLE & Co. have risks in the following Companies, to the aggregate amount of $75,000, distributed in sums of $5,000 to $10,000 each: Mechanics' and Manufacturers', Firemen's, Commercial and Eagle, of this city; Commonwealth, Metropolitan and Home, of New York; Unity, Royal and Equity, of London; North American, of Philadelphia; Commercial, of Cleveland; Phœnix, of Hartford.

Mr. HENSHAW has risks on Manufacturers', $4,000; Buckeye, $4,000; Commercial, $4,000; Central, $4,000; Atlantic, Providence, $3,000; Citizens', $2,000—in all, $20,000. The loss will be about 15 per cent. on the whole amount insured, say $3,000.

CRANE, BREED & Co. were insured in the Firemen's, $5,000; Continental, New-York, $3,000; Home, of New-York, $5,000; North American, Philadelphia, $2,000—in all, $15,000, which will more than cover their loss.

S. N. PIKE & BROTHER will, as we stated yesterday morning, lose about $30,000, of which $10,000 is insured.

Burning of the Massachusetts State Reform School—A Juvenile Incendiary.

From the Boston Journal, Aug. 13.

About half-past five o'clock this morning, the Massachusetts State Reform School Building, for boys, at Westboro' was discovered to be on fire. The flames were found to proceed from the new wing, built of brick, which is reported to have been set on fire by one of the juvenile inmates, who was subsequently arrested and placed in irons. The institution was situated about two and a half miles from the centre o the town of Westboro', and consequently remote from the public means for extinguishing the fire. It was, however, provided with a steam force pump, communicating with a large tank in the upper part of the buildings, from which water was conducted in pipes to every part of the building. These facilities were immediately brought to bear upon the flames, and messengers were dispatched to the neighboring towns for assistance. Engines were promptly on hand from Northboro', Marlboro', and other places, but so rapid was the progress of the devouring element that at half-past six o'clock the wing in which the fire originated had fallen in, and the main building was in flames, and would probably be consumed.

There was only one fire in the building and that was a furnace in the kitchen, used for generating steam with which to do all the cooking and washing. We understand that repeated attempts have been made by the boys within the last six months to burn the Institution.

We learn that the fire was set by a boy who took the straw from his bed and placed it in the ventilator in the upper story of the southerly wing of the building. When discovered the fire had made such headway as to nearly have smothered the young incendiary, who failed to make his escape from the room.

There were about five hundred and sixty boys in the institution, not one of whom, at the last accounts, had escaped, having all been taken and confined in the barn. Ten police officers are to be sent from this city to do guard duty over the boys until they can be moved to a place of security.

Gov. BANKS and Attorney-General PHILLIPS went to Westborough in the 1½ train, to consult with the officers of the institution in regard to the best manner of keeping and caring for the boys.

The building was originally designed for 300 pupils. It consisted of a centre and two wings, of 160 feet front and rear, and of 200 feet in depth on each side. The building cost, when finished and furnished, $65,516. It has since been much enlarged and improved. The cost of the entire institution to the State up to last year was, for buildings and lands, $165,000.

SUDDEN DEATH.—Lieut. ARTHUR B. STANFORD of North Carolina, attached to Revenue steam-cutter Harriet Lane, died, after a very short illness, at the house of Capt. BENNETT, at Tompkinsville, S. I. He had had a slight attack of erysipelas.

MAGNIFICENT PRESENT TO QUEEN VICTORIA.—The London Chronicle says: We can state, on the authority of a private letter from India, that the Maharajah of Cashmere is forwarding, as a present to her Majesty, a most costly shawl tent, which will contain moreover a bedstead of solid gold. The value of this regal offering is said to exceed £150,000.

COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, Aug. 1, 1859.
PROPOSALS FOR $246,500 CENTRAL PARK IMPROVEMENT FUND STOCK.—Sealed Proposals will be received at the Comptroller's Office until Twelve o'clock, M., on TUESDAY, Aug. 23, for the purchase of any part of the balance of four hundred and sixty-six thousand six hundred dollars of the Central Park Improvement Fund Stock of the City of New-York, authorized by an act of the State Legislature entitled "An act for the Regulation and Government of the Central Park," passed April 17, 1859, and by the ordinances of the Common Council approved by the Mayor July 22, 1859.

The said stock will consist of four thousand six hundred and sixty-six shares, of one hundred dollars each, and comprises the remainder of the amount authorized to be issued ($1,500,000) for the improvement of the Central Park in New-York. Interest at six per cent. per annum, payable quarter-yearly from the date, and the principal is redeemable from "The Sinking Fund for the Redemption of the City Debt" on the first day of August 1887, such redemption being further secured by a pledge of the Park and its appurtenances.

Proposals will state the amount of stock desired, the price per share, and the manner in which payments are to be made. The stock when so proposed for and accepted will be required to deposit with the Chamberlain of the City, within five days after the opening of the bids, the stock of the sum awarded to them respectively, including the premium on the whole sum.

The remainder of the amount so awarded will be required to be paid to the Chamberlain on the 20th day of September next. On presenting the receipts of the Chamberlain for the payments thus made to the Comptroller, he will be entitled to receive certificates for equal amounts of the par value of the stock, bearing interest from the dates of such deposits.

Bids respectively should be sealed up and indorsed "Proposals for Central Park Improvement Fund Stock," and the proposals thus sealed and indorsed, put in a envelope, sealed, and addressed to the Comptroller.

The right is reserved on the part of the Comptroller to reject any or all of the bids, if considered necessary to protect or promote the interests of the City.
